False Face

By E. C. Buley

CHAPTER XVIII

PETER MAKES ENQUIRIES

Marchant was looking the other man full in the face, and noted the change in his expression caused by Marcia's mention of his name. Polite indifference gave way to surprise, and something like dismay, for one fleeting second.

Peter looked swiftly at Marcia, and perceived that she too had noticed the effect produced by the simple announcement of his name.

Then Henry Smith smiled, and bowed in a foreign way, which Peter thought ill-suited to a tight-fitting bathing suit.

"A lovely morning, Mr. Marchant," Henry Smith said. "Do you plan to bathe?"

"That was the idea," Peter admitted. "Are you through, Marcia?"

"I think I've had enough for a before-breakfast dip," Marcia said.

"I also," said the unwelcome Henry Smith.

Peter bathed in solitary state; and they did not even wait to walk back from the beach with him. Marcia did call out—

"We are moving along Peter; come into the cottage for breakfast."

And that was that.

Peter rubbed himself dry with vigour, while he speculated on the mysterious Mr. Henry Smith, who had a figure like a Greek statue, and a face worthy of the Indian God Hanuman. When he encountered the man again, in flannels and blazer, his artistic sense was still more outraged by the incongruity of him.

Smith seemed to Marchant to be rather uncomfortable under the close inspection which Peter gave him; and it was quite clear that Marcia was ready to set him more at his ease.

"Mr. Smith and I have arranged a round after breakfast, Peter," she said. "I hope you have brought your clubs. Some girl is sure to be hanging about the club house, and we can make it a foursome."

"My golf clubs, together with the rest of my belongings, were stolen from my New York hotel six months ago," Peter said. "Since then, I have had no opportunity of refitting, Marcia."

"Never mind; we can manage for clubs," Marcia said lightly, her curiosity impervious to Peter's tale.

"I think I should prefer a stroll about the place, to renew old associations," Peter decided. "Perhaps Miss Scanes will take charge of me, and tell me all that has been happenng, during my absence."

"Gladly, Peter," Miss Deborah said heartily. "And I'm dying to hear about your adventures, too."

"But I asked you to play golf, Peter," Marcia said, looking daggers at her aunt.

"So sweet of her, isn't it, Peter," said Miss Deborah. "So charming to select you, the moment you arrive, to make the partner of some maiden unspecified, and be slaughtered by her and the expert Mr Smith."

"Are you an expert, Mr. Smith?" Peter asked.

"I do my best," Smith said, good-naturedly enough.

"No man can do more," Peter approved. "My own idea is not to do so much. I'm out of condition, Marcia, and disposed to be kind to myself. A spot of swimming, a spot of sketching — I'd like to draw you in your swimming kit, Mr. Smith. Magnificent!"

"Must you talk shop, Peter?" Marcia asked.

"Sorry," Peter grinned.

Presently Marcia and Henry Smith walked off with their golf bags, and Peter was left alone with Miss Deborah.

"I'm glad you came, Peter," she said instantly. "Now tell me all about it, please. I know something very unusual has happened."

Peter began forthwith, and told his story at full length, encouraged by Miss Deborah's close attention and pointed questions.

"So that is why we heard nothing from you!" she said, at the conclusion of his narrative. "Well, what do you propose to do next? I'm afraid Marcia is bent on making a fool of herself; but you can see for yourself."

"Yes," Peter agreed. "Marcia promises to be difficult. She has forbidden me to attempt any explanation; and she will not listen to you, I suppose?"

"She'll snub me to extinction, if I say one word on your behalf," Miss Deborah said bitterly. "Well, I am glad you did not come back at her bidding, Peter; though you say that you intended to do so."

"I could not face losing Marcia," Peter answered. "Not then; nor at present, either. Now who is this Smith, and where and when did she annex him?"

ELLEN'S DIARY

of our "goods and chattels," not actually committing to paper every item to arrive thus at our gains and losses — though this too has its place in farming — but giving to all much consideration. Resolving this year to cut expenses here or there, or maybe to increase, modestly of course, such lines and methods as have been proven on these acres of ours. Though it is a fact of farming that little can be valued in monetary return with any degree of accuracy. Benefits — and losses, are so far-reaching that often neither can be reckoned entirely in one generation.

We may find the returns of another's good farming, years after his hands are forever stilled; and . . . But there is James calling: "Is there no bread but that fresh 'stuff,' Ellen "
