 LONDON — (CP) — A passenger who crossed the Atlantic by air said he passed the time by watching the stewardess going up and down on her regular duties. He estimated that she walked five miles during the 12-hour flight.

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

There was a time when the hand that rocked the cradle was the hand that ruled the world. Today there is another hand which rocks the cradle — the hand of the government. The baby it rocks is destined to grow up in economic slavery, burdened with debt and lashed by the whip of totalitarianism unless some measure is put into effect to release it from its burdens. In a wilderness of sand, 100 miles south of the Dead Sea, is found the amazing city of Petra. It used to be the headquarters of a tribe of caravan robbers in the days of Christ. Although no one has lived in this magic city of mighty tombs for centuries, it still attracts scholars and travelers who must seek the aid of Bedouins to lead them through the narrow canyon that offers the only entrance to the city. The slit in the rock is so narrow that in places one can stretch out one's arms and touch both walls.

After traversing this gloomy passage, a glorious vision springs from a cliff straight ahead. A gleaming rose-colored temple built by Greek artists, at the order of the King of ancient Petra. Spread over the rock temple are delicate flower symbols, wonderful carvings and goddesses — all this beauty lies within the hidden city of Petra whose natural mountain walls rise up more than a thousand feet, and are so steep that no one could possibly climb up or down them.

There you have it, a picture of the enchanted city of Petra, still standing after centuries, eternal, silent, and alone like the Sphinx.

To every four gallons of water there is one gallon of salt in the Dead Sea which is why when you try to swim in it you bob about like a cork.

The most wonderful building in Jerusalem is the Dome of the Rock. It's a Moslem mosque, as sacred to people of the Mohammedan faith as the Church of the Holy Sepulcher is to all Christians.

It stands on the spot where the Temple of Solomon once rested

East Royalty News
 Well, Cubs and Scouts, I guess you are all anxiously waiting for your meetings to start again.

East Royalty Pack got off to a good start Friday evening when they held their first regular meeting. Nearly every Cub was present and in full uniform.

Everyone at the meeting, besides learning something about Cubbing, said they had a most enjoyable evening of outdoor games, stories and songs. During Red Flower test work was reviewed and the importance of honesty and loyalty was stressed by Akela.

This is just one of the many interesting meetings this pack has planned for the coming year, so everyone between the ages of eight and twelve wishing to enjoy the fun these Cubs have, as well as the knowledge they gain, at their weekly meetings, may do so by going to East Royalty School this Friday at 6 P.M.

and still is a delicate and well-preserved building in spite of the fact that it was erected in 698 A. D. Atop this temple is a rough granite slab upon which Abraham proposed to sacrifice his son Isaac. The Mohammedans believe that their prophet Mohammed was brought to this rock by a winged horse from Mecca. Certainly there are footprints in the rock that look like those of a horse. But of course the yarn is only a legend.

It is possible that the Act of the Covenant and all of Solomon's treasures are buried in the winding caverns that lie beneath this historic pile of stone. If these treasures are there, and if they could be brought to light, it would be one of the greatest finds in the history of archaeology.

Knowing this, several groups of adventurers have tried to dig their way under the rock, right under the noses of the guards but were discovered in the end and driven off.

Some day the Act of the Covenant will be dug from the soil of the Holy City of Jerusalem. They may even come upon Solomon's mummy and treasure untold. If and when these writings are unearthed, they are apt to be buried under Abraham's Rock.

The natives of western Australia have domesticated thousands of wild dogs which are called dingoes.

Upwards of 100,000 camels are often used in transporting tea from Kalgan to Siberia, while in the external caravan trade no fewer than 1,200,000 camels and 300,000 ox-carts are employed.

Did you ever see a nightingale or hear one sing? Just to look at one you'd never believe that such a homely little bird could have such a golden voice. Only the males are capable of song. But what melody comes from the tiny voice. The Persian city of Isfahan is the home of this bird.

Most of the people of modern Persia are poverty stricken, but the nobles and other so-called "blue bloods" are rich enough to adorn their persons in diamond headdresses and pearl necklaces. One of the most costly and dazzling of collections of jewels on earth belongs to the Persian King. It contains two thrones decorated with emeralds and rubies as big as hen's eggs.

Each year, in Udaipur, India, an elephant fight takes place across a stone wall, otherwise the animals would kill each other. They strike with their tusks, wrestle with their trunks, and trumpet loudly. The struggle goes on until one beast sinks on his knees from exhaustion. The victor receives a medal, and an extra bale of hay.

Ancient peoples were not strange to the use of gloves, though they were not worn by such members as wear them in our time. The wearing of gloves was common among the Romans, and the gift of a pair of gloves was once part of a ceremony used in granting possession of lands. Persons removed from high office had their gloves taken from them as a mark of degradation.

Another use of gloves was in a duel. He who threw one down, was by this act understood to give defiance, and he who picked it up, accepted the challenge.

The gloves given by Henry VIII to Sir Anthony Denny were sold for 38 pound, 17 shillings. Those given by Queen Elizabeth to Denny's wife brought over 25 pounds. Today gloves are worn at weddings, funerals, etc.

The Thorpe Affair

By Phillip Lesly

The hoodlum shook his head. Then his eyes closed and he sank back. Terry grabbed the wrist again, felt the pulse. It was still going, but very faintly. Batson might never regain consciousness and Terry had to find Kay, had to discover who had paid for the kidnapping.

He got to his feet, rushed to the bedroom door. He threw it open and looked in. There was no one there. He tried the library, with the same result. He fought down a feeling of panic, rushed back to the bedroom. His eyes fell on a closet door. He jerked it open.

There on the floor, her face covered by a handkerchief and her arms and legs made helpless by ropes, lay Kay. She blinked as the door opened and light flooded in but when she saw Terry her eyes came alight.

Hurriedly he released her from the bonds and helped her to her feet. He rubbed her wrists and knuckles to get the blood to circulate normally again. Then she fell into his arms limply.

He held her close to him, as if to make certain she would stay there. Neither spoke for a moment, while both felt strange, light sensations welling up within them.

The tension relieved, she began to sob softly. The emotions that had been pent up during those minutes of maddening uncertainty now found release. With her face on Terry's shoulder, she allowed them to become free. He held her close to him gently, saying nothing; but his eyes were clouded, his mouth was not firm.

Finally she managed to curb her tears. She dabbed at her eyes and managed a smile.

"Crying like a baby," she said sheepishly. "I must be going soft."

Terry avoided mention of his emotions. Instead, he lifted her chin and lowered his lips to her. She did not resist. Her arms came up around his neck and clung to him. The room was silent for long seconds.

When he released her, Terry turned away, not letting her see his expression. He walked to the door and looked at Batson's unconscious form. The movement exposed to her view the patch on the side of his head.

"What happened to you?" she asked.

"Oh, just a scratch. I had a little more luck on the receiving end of a gun than our friend Batson here." He turned to her concernfully. "Say, how do you happen to be here, anyway?"

She sighed and walked out into the parlor. She fell onto the davenport and motioned to him to follow suit. He did.

"I have a lot of kid habits," Kay said. "One of them is crying after everything is all over. Another one is reading the personal ads in the classified sections of the newspaper. I remember when I was 10—and that wasn't as long ago as you might think—I'd get sore because I couldn't find out what some of the ads meant. Well, this morning I saw one that looked interesting. Here, I've got it with me."

She turned away from him and reached into her blouse. Then she turned back and handed him a scrap of paper. Under a heading that read "Personals" was:

"H. R. T.
 "It's warm. Must stay in a few days. Will be at Royale, 817, at 6 P.M."
 "H. T."

"Of course," Kay said, "the names are phonies. The whole thing was put in just on the chance that I'd see it and try to follow it up. Whoever thought of that wasn't exactly an imbecile. Anyway, I came to see if I could horn in on the meeting and find out what it was all about. See, 'It's warm' means that the heat's on. 'Must stay in a few days' is a way of saying you have to lay low. And the rest is simple enough. I felt pretty good when I figured it out; as if I'd just solved some tough puzzle."

"It was a smart trick," Terry conceded. "The guy's printing it. I mean—not your falling for it."

She made a face at him, then went on. "I got here and started scouting around. I stood at the door and listened, but there wasn't a sound inside. Then I looked through the keyhole, but I couldn't see anybody. It was a few minutes before 6, so I thought that probably there wasn't anyone in yet. I tried the door and it was open. That should have warned me away, but I didn't think it was possible that they'd be laying a trap for anyone so subtly."

As she spoke, Terry watched her eyes, her lips, her nose. There was nothing affected about her; every slight movement was just right.

"And they caught you?" he inquired.

She nodded. "I went in, thinking I'd be better able to listen if I were inside somewhere. I got past the doorway, all right. But then I felt a hand crushed against my mouth and an arm pulled my arm up behind my back till I thought it was broken. Whoever it was said, 'If you make a peep, I'll pull it off!' Then he tied the handkerchief over my mouth and roped my arms and legs."
