The importance of an elocutionary training is forcing itself upon educational authorities so strongly that we need not be surprised to see ere long a chair of elocution established in any university that intends to keep abreast with the times.

The Principal.

The principal of a school has many opportunities to impress his personal character upon the pupils under his charge. If he is the right man for the position, he should do some teaching in every room during the year, and thus learn about the work of each class, and come in contact directly with every pupil in the building.
