Eskimo Delegates Discuss Aspects Of Co-operatives

By STEWART MacLEOD

FROBISHER BAY, N.W.T. (CP)—Eskimo delegates from 16 far-flung Arctic communities are ready to put on their mukluks and fan out over the bleak terrain to tell the folks back home how the co - operative movement might change the face of the north.

For a week, the Eskimos and about 30 white people — some northern residents, local government employees and a battery of northern affairs experts from Ottawa—sat around conference tables here to make reports, swap ideas and chew out problems in the first conference of Arctic co-operatives.

It was, everyone agreed, a resounding success.

Co-operatives, unheard of in the north five years ago, now are in business in 16 communities, doing everything from skinning muskrats to building houses. One in five Eskimos now has a membership in these organizations. Last year they sold $360,000 worth of goods; this year experts predict it will be more than $1,000,000.

NO COMMUNICATION

Until this conference was organized by the northern affairs department, few co - ops had ever heard of the others. They operated in their own little isolated communities, solving their own problems without knowing other groups were doing the same thing.

Delegates worked through two interpreters who: (1) Turned Western Eskimo into Eastern Eskimo and vice versa; (2) Turned French into English and then into the two Eskimo dialects; and (3) European - flavored English into Canadian-type English along with two forms of Eskimo.

The delegates took a giant stride toward unity. After they arrive home by plane and dogsled, they will poll their members on the idea of forming a national federation, and a proposal for a central marketing outlet in the south.

The possibility of pouring Eskimo products into the south delights the Eskimos who gathered inside the metal walls of the barrack-shaped IODA Hall to make their voices heard over the roar of the central-heating furnace nearby.

KAYAKS HAVE MOTORS

One by one they jumped up to say so. Oshaweetuk (most Eskimos have only one name) rattled off the information in Eskimo that before the Cape Dorset co-op was organized to ship out carvings, most people in the community didn't even have lumber for kayaks. Now they have kayaks with outboard motors.

Etoogooloopia, from Frobisher Bay, told about a fishing co-op that developed smoked Arctic char. Char sells for $1 a pound and since Eskimos don't particularly like it, the market will be in the white man's land. Business is good, he told the meeting.

Mrs. Bessie Irish came 2,000 miles from Aklavik to report the co-op there was hitting the market with muskrat parkas and members were eager for a big southern sales.
southern sales.

Oolateetak from Resolute Bay placed an order for one of the parkas. Henry Annatuk from Port Burwell did, too.

DINSDALE ATTENDS

Northern Affairs Minister Dinsdale flew in from Ottawa for one day of the conference and described it as a historic event. He said the growth of co-operatives in the north "is one of the most encouraging developments . . . in recent years."

In most cases a white man is hired by the co-ops to run the business end — in two cases RCMP officers, in another a Roman Catholic missionary. Some are northern affairs personnel, some have no other business connection.

By coming to Frobisher, the delegates were able to see the first Arctic housing co - op, where 15 members built themselves three-bedroom bungalows that vault them into relative luxury. The prefabricated buildings each cost $4,637, but a federal government subsidy reduces this by $1,000. The co-op members pay $147 down, build the houses together and pay off the mortgage at $35 a month. Members who didn't show up for work, or send a replacement, are charged $2 an hour.
