

Dear Editor:

I would just like to point out the appalling abuse of the handicapped parking on this campus. The other day as I parked my car, in the pouring rain at the end of the tennis court parking lot, I was angry to see two little old ladies, books in hand, RACE to their class from a car in the handicapped zone. Neither of these ladies appeared remotely handicapped. I and a campus security officer immediately checked the suspect car for a handicapped tag. To our surprise there it lay on the dash.

Now one says to themselves if the ladies are not handicapped... who is? Unfortunately the abuse by people in our society of such advantages for the disadvantaged leads to further abuse and mockery. It is unfortunate that these special tags are mobile and can be used at anyone's convenience.

Whoever you are out there that think these parking spots are a joke, I wish you to re-examine your conscience for a little guilt and think twice the next time.

Sincerely,

Kate

Dear Editor:

I am writing because of something that disturbed me on Sunday. I was coming here to do some photocopying and a little work. My sisters (13 & 8) asked if they could come. I was showing them around campus when we stopped in the bathroom in main. Where I noticed one of the posters for the take back the night march had "weird" written across it. I was a little agitated about this and explained to my 13 year old sister what the idea is behind The Take Back The Night March was. I said "why would somebody write wierd about a march that is to promote the fact that women should be able to walk down the street without fear of being attacked and/or raped!" The reply to my surprise came from my 8 year old sister. She replied, "What's weird about that?" So to the person who wrote weird on the poster maybe you would like to answer our question!!
