AN INDIAN'S ORATION.

Flying Cloud's Masterly and Thrilling Speech.

Worthy of Ingersoll, Blaine, Gladstone or Bismarck—The Bloody Past and the Peaceful Present—Presented in a Verbal Panorama—Here is a Lesson to Heed.

The Indian is the most poetic race in the world, in their relations with their own; in their habits when not on the warpath; in their customs, songs, dances; in their belief in the happy hunting ground, and in their conceptions of the Great Manitou.

The following is an extract from the speech of Flying Cloud, a famous Kickapoo medicine man:

"Children of the Great Spirit, whose form is in the air, though invisible, I am here to tell you of our wrongs and of our rights!

"Four hundred years ago a Great White Man sailed from Spain to find a New World. That World was the Red Man's. Then all went well with our forefathers from the upper waters of the Hurons to the Great Warm Gulf that kissed the land of Fruit and Flowers, where the Simmoines hunted and fished.

"The Indian welcomed the White Man, and for that welcome our people were driven step by step toward the great Salt Lake, beneath which drops the Great Spirit's Eye every day when twilight comes down upon the earth.

Catlin says: "The word of an Indian can always be relied upon."

"We are scattered like leaves when autumn winds shake the trees of the forest.

"We, the Kickapoos, whose home was once in Illinois, later in Kansas, and is now in the land of the Sacs and Foxes, are at peace with the White Man. What we have, that we will give to our White Brother.

"Our Kickapoo Indian Sagwa makes men live to be one hundred years old.

"There are Red Men living who have used it ever since they were young men, and who are now so old that they can only sit, lie and sleep in the sun.

"Our Kickapoo Indian Oil is the foe of pain.

"Our Kickapoo Cough Cure stops the hand of death.

"Our Kickapoo Indian Salve heals and cures all wounds, and our Kickapoo Worm Killer preserves the lives of papooses.

"Our 'Sagwa'—good medicine—is from the great mother of us all—Nature. All that is best that grows in the woods, that blossoms on the plain, that hides in the earth, our Sagwa contains. It has preserved the lives of our warriors and our women.

"It acts upon the body like sunshine on the trees and flowers, and gives life and strength to all who use it. Men and women who partake of it freely can only die of old age.

"This secret which the Kickapoos alone possess, they give freely to their white brother. It is our richest offering.

"I have spoken. Let the voices of the world bear answer to what I have said!"

Without doubt the Indian has a profound knowledge of the mysterious herbs with which they cure radically many formidable diseases which baffle the greatest physicians of the world.

Those remedies can now be obtained of any druggist or wholesale dealer. The Kickapoo Indian Sagwa is one dollar per bottle. Six for five dollars. The Cough Cure is fifty and all the other remedies twenty-five cents per bottle. In using these remedies you may be absolutely certain that they are purely vegetable, that they contain no acids or mineral poisons, because the Indians know absolutely nothing of these harmful drugs.

The Kickapoo Indian Medicines are genuine Indian made. How they came to be given to the world is fully explained in our large book, which we gladly send free to all applying who care for it sufficiently to write us enclosing three 2c. stamps to pay postage. DRESS FOR THE MEN.

ENGLISH IDEAS NOT NOW SO POPULAR AS THEY HAVE BEEN.

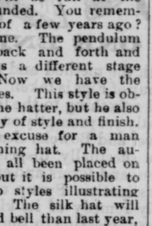
As the Outing Shirts and Flannel Suits Disappear Correct Styles for the Winter Come to the Front—Full, Rounded Outlines in Hats—Plain Linen for Evening Dress.

O for the well-dressed man. Here is September at hand and what is he going to wear? Anglomania is at an end, according to The New York Herald's tailoring expert, and each succeeding season finds us more original. Just at present the well-dressed man is in a chrysalis state, not yet having emerged from his butterfly existence of the summer to the more sober tints of the fall, but in a few weeks, presto! And we shall hardly know him.

To the flannel suit and blazer,
To the outing shirt and tie,
To the easy shoe of russet
He will bid a fond good-by.

That is, let us hope that the russet shoe will desert with the waning of the season. There has been observed a decided tendency in the past in favor of the russet shoe for cold weather. Most of the shoe dealers have been obliged to satisfy this demand and make up a heavier article for the winter. It it isn't stopped we shall be wearing russet shoes with evening dresses next. Can one imagine anything more horrible?

But about Anglomania. Nothing is more pleasing than to note the growing divergence between American and English fashions. This year it will perhaps be more evident in the hat than anything else. The English derby is small. The American derby this year will be full at the crown and more rounded. You remember the pointed hat of a few years ago? That was one extreme. The pendulum of fashion swings back and forth and each season marks a different stage in its progress. Now we have the full, rounded outlines. This style is observed by Dunlap, the hatter, but he also has the usual variety of style and finish. So really there is no excuse for a man wearing an unbecoming hat. The autumn hats have not all been placed on the market as yet, but it is possible to give in advance two styles illustrating the leading shapes. The silk hat will have a more decided bell than last year, and a man with slim legs not wearing an overcoat will present a somewhat top-heavy appearance. That is if he desires to go to the extreme. But the well-dressed man never goes to extremes. He abhors the loud shirtings, the exaggerated outlines of many of our younger swells, who ought to know better. The hats shown in the illustrations are from fall designs by Dunlap.



Speaking of shirtings, they will be severely plain. The correct thing for evening dress will be plain white linen with preferably two studs, although there can be no objection to wearing three.

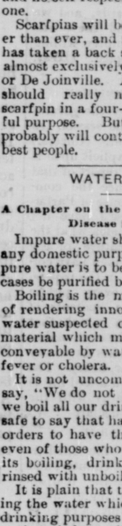
In collars there is little change, the turned over points being most desirable. A new shape just put on the market is quite high, with points slightly turned, and but little space between. In cuffs square ends only are permissible. There has been a marked tendency of late years to discard the broadcloth for dress suits, and this is still noticeable, worsteds and vicunas being the most popular materials. But broadcloth will always be worn, especially by mature men. The dress coat will have slightly longer tails, the waistcoat will be cut more V shaped than formerly, and the trousers, of course, will be slightly snugger in fit than those worn during the day. Silk waistcoats will be popular. Trousers will have a slight spring this season, but whether they will be well received remains to be seen. Individual tastes are likely to govern these matters to a great extent and with regard to the size certainly a man's legs have certainly something to do with it. But for the average well-dressed man trousers will be nineteen inches wide at the knee and seventeen and a half at the bottom. For the pattern stripes are always in style, gray colors predominating, and a check, if it be very small, is not desirable.

It has just been said that the tails of dress suits will be longer, and this is true of all autumn suits. The frock coat began last year to grow longer and it still continues. Frocks this year will be longer then ever, and, like the now old-fashioned Newmarket, will almost sweep the ground. This offers a splendid chance for the extremeists. Some of them, no doubt, will have trails to their frocks coats and will wear silk hose on rainy days for street-crossing purposes.

To correspond with the length of undercoats, overcoats, of course, will be very long. Of these there is a great variety. Close-fitting outer garments are coming in again, but the box will still be worn. The length of the coat is evidenced in the accompanying illustration. For evening dress the Inverness will be the only coat worn this year by the quiet correct. This will be made of frosted beavers or smooth goods in black. In colors blue has gone out more or less, and grays will predominate. These will be especially prominent in the frock coat. The three-buttoned cut-away still continues to be the most graceful and satisfactory garment worn. The wide silk braid has been discarded and English stitching is as popular as it was in the spring. The tail will be quiet long. As for the sack the three-buttoned style will be popular. It will be cut away more in front and be very much longer behind.

The leaning to grays leads to a few words about the glove, which will be of gray undressed kid for the autumn, and this style may possibly extend into the winter. The dealers tried to introduce these gloves in pearl colors last year, but they were only adopted only by a select few. Now, however, they seem to be here to stay, although the different shades of tan will always be popular.

The writer looked over some new styles of neckwear the other day that have not been placed on the market. They were all of silk, the satin tie being almost a relic of the past, as it is impossible to tie satin into a graceful knot and it does not wear well. Different designs were shown, the prevailing colors being a black or dark blue background relieved by dashes of color in small figures. The four-in-hand will be a trifle wider in the ends than formerly, and, where the figures are larger, when tied the knot will be somewhat larger in proportion. But the small knot, with wide flowing ends, is the correct thing. Two popular styles are given in the cuts subjoined.



Over in Paris the rage over Loie Fuller has reched the height of recklessness in neckwear, and serpentine ties in all sorts of changeable colors are the correct thing. We shall probably develop this form of insanity soon, but the well dressed man will be quieter in his taste and wear something less startling than a scarf that resembles the headlight of an engine. By the way, the Moorish and Persion scarfs of last winter are no more. They were too brilliant to last. It should be almost unnecessary to mention that the ready-made tie is a thing not to be thought of twice. The manufacturers are putting up some pretty designs in ready-made scarfs, and are succeeding somewhat better than formerly in making a closer imitation of the tie scarf. But alas! that is all that can be said. To many minds a ready-made scarf is a sure sign of shiftlessness, and no self-respecting man cares to wear one.

Scarfpins will be, if anything, smaller than ever, and now that the Ascot tie has taken a back seat they will be worn almost exclusively in the four-in-hand or De Joinville. Anything unnecessary should really not be worn, and a scarfpin in a four-in-hand serves no useful purpose. But they are worn, and probably will continue to be worn by the best people.

WATER AND FOOD.

A Chapter on the Necessity of Nipping Disease in the Germ.

Impure water should not be used for any domestic purpose. When only impure water is to be had, it should in all cases be purified before use.

Boiling is the most common method of rendering innocuous or sterile any water suspected or known to contain material which might produce diseases conveyable by water, such as typhoid fever or cholera.

It is not uncommon to hear people say, "We do not fear cholera because we boil all our drinking water." Yet it is safe to say that half of those who give orders to have the water boiled, and even of those who themselves attend to its boiling, drink water from vessels rinsed with unboiled water.

It is plain that the good effects of boiling the water which is to be used for drinking purposes are lost, if the pitcher, or the salad, or the milk can, or the milk jug has been rinsed with unboiled water. The boiling of water is an excellent precaution, but the use of boiled water should be extended.

Of the water used in the household, the proportion devoted to drinking purposes is relatively small. In the kitchen water is used for washing vegetables and salads, for rinsing dishes and tableware. One or two germs of disease, clinging to the sides of a vessel into which milk has afterward been poured, may find the milk an excellent soil in which to grow and propagate their species.

From food which has been subjected to roasting, to boiling, or to thorough cooking, there is nothing to fear. From uncooked foods and from fluids danger is possible, and in the process of their preparation for consumption they should be guarded from every possible source of contamination.

The use of any of the filters which are fastened to faucets on the pipes of the city water supply, it is, perhaps, needless to say, does not afford the slightest protection against disease germs.

Water which contains mineral impurity, or, indeed, an appreciable quantity of organic matter, should not be used under any circumstances.—Youth's Companion.

A Voice of Comfort.

Though love be bought and honor sold,
The wanes: keeps its glow of gold;
And round the rosy summits cold
The white clouds hover, fold on fold.

Though over ripe the nations rot,
Though right be dead and faith forgot,
Though one dull cloud the heav'ns may blot,
The tender leaf delayeth not.

Though all the world be sunk in ill,
The beauteous autumn's mellow still,
By virgin sand and sea-worn hill,
The constant waters ebb and fill.

From out the throng and stress of lies,
From out the painful noise of sighs,
One voice of comfort seems to rise,
"It is the meaner part that dies."
—Lewis Morris.

She Gave Him a Check.

"But for my husband I might have gone to jail once," laughed a bright little business woman the other day. "It was in honeymoon time, and, like many brides, I thought all my husband's belongings were mine, and what was mine was my own, as the saying goes. During his absence a man called with a bill for $80. I got the check book and made out a check, signed my husband's name and paid the account. The next day a bank messenger came in with what he said was a forgery, and for a while the air was blue. Finally I mustered courage to explain, but since then I have never opened his letters. I find the rule 'mind your own business,' works as well at home as in the store."—New York Sun.
