LaMarsh Strong On Politics, Observers On Hill Consider

By JAMES NELSON

OTTAWA (CP) — To Parliament Hill observers, Judy LaMarsh appears to live politics in every moment of her life.

In Commons speeches or while answering questions in the House, the health minister is keenly aware of every political implication of what her opponents say, and answers them in kind.

In press interviews, she gives the impression of holding herself in, barely able to restrain herself from biting aspersions on anyone who isn't working for the Liberal party.

This week she levelled a shaft at the Conservative premier of Ontario, John Robarts.

Mr. Robarts, in the midst of an election campaign, came to Ottawa to attend a federal-provincial conference on pensions and to state his government's willingness to modify its own portable pensions plan so as to be compatible with the proposed federal scheme.

AWARE OF HEAT

Miss LaMarsh, a Niagara Falls, Ont., lawyer obviously aware with the heat being engendered by pensions in the Ontario campaign, commented afterwards she doubted whether Mr. Robarts was entirely plain in his words—and declared that Ontario wasn't sure where it was going.

Mr. Robarts' response was that henceforth he would bypass the lady cabinet minister on pensions matters and deal directly with Prime Minister Pearson.

Fast becoming recognized as one of the more controversial members of the cabinet, Miss LaMarsh, 38, was first elected to the Commons in a 1960 by-election and now heads a money - spending department second only to the defence ministry.

On her entry into the Commons as an opposition MP, she let it be clearly understood that hers wasn't to be a political career of gentle daubins with a powder puff, but one of two-fisted virility.

She called Conservative Leader John Diefenbaker a crybaby on one occasion and said he was seeking votes out of sympathy and should go back to his Prairie home and cry.

ON TRUTH SQUAD

She figured large in this spring's general election campaign as the leading member of the Truth Squad which set out to follow Mr. Diefenbaker on the campaign trail.

When she became a cabinet minister, she said she would have to buy a wig because she couldn't take the time necessary to keep her coiffure in order with long beauty - parlor sessions.

She gave up cigarettes, after years of heavy smoking, and admitted that for a while the break didn't make her disposition too pleasant. Lately she has spoken of going on a diet.

She played the part of The Lady Known as Lou in an Ottawa philharmonic springtime party and had her picture widely published in the cheesecake pose of a Yukon belle of the goldrush days. She is given to wearing large and dramatic hats.

Someone in her department found a medical journal reference to the toxic effects of the juice of the dieffenbachia plant. A question was asked in the Commons and Miss LaMarsh, obviously relishing the play on the position leader's name, said that its poison was no longer considered as dangerous as it might have been.
