

Odds and Ends.

THE CHINA QUESTION.

"You never see such chancey no were how, as this," said Mrs. Partington, as she took from an obscure corner of the old cupboard a teapot of antique appearance, noseless and handleless, and cracked here and there, and stayed with putty where Time's mischievous fingers had threatened a dissolution of the union.

"That teapot was my grandmother's afore she was married; I remember it just as well as it was yesterday."

"Remember when your grandmother was married?" queried Ike.

"No, no, the teapot," responded she; "and it was a perfect beauty, with the Garden of Eden on it, and flowers and Adam and Eve on it, so natural that you might almost smell their fragrance."

"What, smell Adam and Eve?" said Ike.

"No, the flowers, stupid!" replied she; "my grandfather gave it to her as a memento mori of his undying infection, because the colors wouldn't fade, and they never have, though children are destroying angels, and they made the mischief among the crockery, as they always do now-a-days."

She had held the teapot in her hands as she spoke, and now she gazed in silence upon the picture of Adam and Eve, partially concealed in the bushes, and she revelled in the memory of the past, and wondered if her grandmother ever came back to look at the old teapot that she had preserved so carefully, as an heirloom; then, carefully brushing off some dust that rested upon it, she replaced it, and charged Ike impressively to keep it most sacrilegiously for her sake.

He said he would, as plain as his mouth full of preserved plums would let him, and wiped his mouth on the sleeve of his best jacket.

Sympathy.—"Here's fresh halibut!" cried the fish-vender, beneath Mrs. Partington's window.

"I know it is, you poor cretur!" said the estimable lady, looking after him with a commiserating expression; "I know it is, and I believe it is the seventh fresh haul about that he made by here to-day; and he speaks so pitiful, too, when he is telling us of it, it makes my very heart ache for him."

She caught not the deep significance of the cry; but her benevolence, always on the alert, construed it into an appeal for sympathy. Heaven's blessings on thee, Mrs. Partington, and with reverence be it wished, where hearts are regarded, may you turn up a trump.

NEW REMEDY FOR A DROUGHT.—Mrs Partington was in the country one August, and for a whole month not one drop of rain had fallen. One day she was slowly walking along the road, with her umbrella over her head, when an old man, who was mending up a little gap of wall, accosted her, at the same time depositing a large stone on the top of his pile.

"Mrs. Partington, what do you think can help this ere drought?"

The old lady looked at him through her spectacles, at the same time smelling a fern leaf.

"I think," said she, in a tone of oracular wisdom, "I think a little rain would help it as much as anything."

It was a great thought. The old gentleman took off his straw hat, and wiped his head with his cotton handkerchief, at the same time saying that he thought so too.

"Don't crowd so, good woman," said old Roger, at the Lowell Institute, as he was waiting his turn to give his name.

"Don't crowd so!" and, looking over his shoulder, he met the reproachful glance of Mrs. Partington herself, who was there for the same purpose. He immediately gave way to her, and the next morning found himself not divisible by 7, nor anything like it. "So much for politeness!" growled old Roger; "she'll get all the Natural Religion now; and much good may it do her!" You would have smiled to see the spiteful manner in which the little man said this.

"Have your cabbages tender hearts?" asked a woman of a costermonger. "They can't have anything else, marm," was the reply, "for they've been crying about the streets all the morning."

"My German friend, how long have you been married?" Vell, dat is a ting vat I seldom don't like to talk about, but ven I does, it seems so long as never vas."

Supposing a heavy shower to have just given over, what resemblance does it bear to the tale of a fox? One is the end of a hard rain, and the other is the end of a reynard.

If a man has a right to be proud of anything it is of a good action, done as it ought to be, without any base interest lurking at the bottom of it.

A man named Peck, in St. Louis, raises his children by the bushel. He has 10 pecks now—two bushels and a half.

Vehemence creates dislike, excessive mildness contempt; be neither so severe as to be hated, nor so tame as to be insulted.

The person who said that his mouth never uttered a lie, probably spoke through his nose.

Josh Billings says he has "seen some awful and bad throate diseases cured in 3 days by simply jineing a temperance society."

When a gentleman steps on a lady's train the lady should turn around and say politely, "I beg your pardon, sir," and the gentleman should bow and say "I accept your apology, madame."

A codfish breakfast and an india rubber coat will keep any man dry.

A fox often fancies he is cock of the walk, when he is only a coxcomb.

What is the greatest Let ever made? The alphabet.

A man who retires from business and lives on the interest of his money may be said to be resting on his oars.
