Police Criticized In Blackmarket Babies Case

MONTREAL, (CP)—A defence lawyer criticized the police handling of a lawyer's arrest in connection with what law authorities have described as a multi-million dollar blackmarket in babies.

Myer Gross told Judge Gerald Almond Friday a "circus" arrest was made in the case of Herman Buller, 38-year-old Montreal lawyer, charged with falsifying entries in a birth certificate and giving advice in connection with an indictable offence.

Buller was arrested at Montreal airport as he, his wife and her parents, prepared to board a plane for Israel.

"Never has a case been prosecuted in this fashion," said Mr. Gross. "The newspapers had pictures of the accused in their pages before he even knew he was to face charges."

"He is being condemned before his case is even heard and the publicity is causing him a great deal of prejudice. This case has been instigated by the United States authorities, our good friends below the border."

Mr. Gross continued: "They knew of this case two years ago and their knowledge is exactly the same today. They waited two years to arrest him at the airport. They wanted to pick him up so they could claim he was going to abscond by plane."

"How could he have any such intention when he and all his family had purchased return tickets? I predict Buller will be acquitted at preliminary hearing as he was in a similar case three years ago."

Queen, Duke Rest Before Renewed Activity

CANBERRA, (AP)—Thousands knelt in the dust around St. John's Anglican Church here Sunday when Queen Elizabeth and the Duke of Edinburgh attended morning service. The little stone church, built 110 years ago, holds only 200 people and admission was therefore restricted to the royal party and those parishioners who normally attend morning service. Even the churchwardens—who regularly attend evening services—were not admitted and had to join in the service outside.

Snow Plows Break Down Under Heavy Pressure

Roads in Kings County were partly opened yesterday, as plows laboured to reopen highways which were closed following Friday's storm. Most received only one cut, however, before plows broke down under the heavy pressure of already piled up snow. The Murray River, Lower Montague, Montague, Cardigan and Annandale plows were broken down yesterday but it is understood that the Montague and Cardigan plows have been fixed up and will be out on the main highways this morning.

Island Odds And Ends

Canada has enacted many social security measures in the last dozen years, many of them so far advanced, as to bring the nation into the fringe area at least of the welfare state.

Not all of these meet with unanimous acceptance. Unemployment insurance for instance has its critics in all strata of Canadian life. Most people are familiar with the arguments against the Act, through discussing it informally during working hours in office, shop or store.

Students of social legislation, however, credit Unemployment Insurance with a far greater influence on the economic well-being of Canada than any superficial judgment reveals. Its value cannot be measured by statistics although these are significant. That more than six hundred million dollars has been paid out in benefits since the Act came into operation more than twelve years ago is not to be disregarded.

To the thousands of beneficiaries these payments were of primary importance. Usually they came at a time when money was urgently needed, and helped to bridge over a period of unemployment which without them might have meant hardship.

But there is another and perhaps larger way of looking at the unemployment insurance plan. In considering merely the direct benefits in amounts of money received by qualified persons this other aspect may be entirely overlooked. It should not be overlooked because all Canadians whether they ever draw a cent from the Unemployment Insurance fund or not are vitally interested in unemployment insurance.

The question is sometimes asked: "What does the employer get out of unemployment insurance?" It is a fair question. The unemployment insurance Act requires the employer as well as the insured employee to help build up the fund. The employer does not draw any direct monetary benefit.

What does the manufacturer, storekeeper, contractor, and all those in the employer category gain from this plan? One of the important things he gains might best be expressed in the single word, "stability." In order that business may be carried on successfully those operating the business must be assured of continuity. They must feel that there is the minimum of danger of what is popularly known as a "slump" or a serious depression.

Unemployment on a large scale accompanies a depression. Not only is it a cause, but it is a result of such a condition. Unemployment insurance helps to prevent conditions which can precipitate a depression. Not only does it provide purchasing power to the unemployed but it tends to allay the fear and worry, so often accompanying unemployment in the past. The consciousness that a fund exists from which may be drawn benefits by the insured unemployed, creates a feeling of confidence rather than of fear. This is of great value in staving off depressed thinking which may lead to depressed conditions.

The employer of course benefits from the fact that the flow of money is not immediately stopped when unemployment strikes. Supposing the employer is a grocer located in a town where there are a number of industries. Some of these industries find it necessary to reduce their staffs or even close down temporarily. Their employees cease to draw wages for the period that work is suspended. Before unemployment insurance was initiated such employees found themselves with greatly reduced spending power if indeed any at all.

The effect was felt by the grocer at once. His business depended on the buying power of his customers. He might give credit for a time but that could not last long. Now unemployment insurance guarantees him a measure of business, because his out-of-work customers are able to draw unemployment insurance benefits.

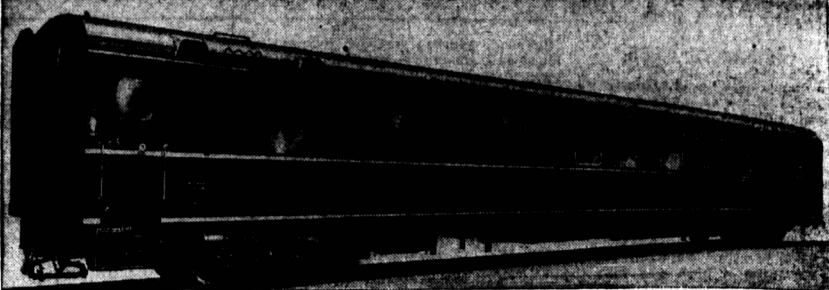

This is the buying power of, of course, he multiplied very many times. Remove, or reduce materially, the buying power of an appreciable number of workers, and the effect on a community, a province or even on the entire country is very marked. Those who went through the depressed periods of the early 30's will remember the effect of an economy lacking any system of unemployment insurance.

THE "NEW LOOK" IN TRAVEL—This is the new sleeping car introduced by the Canadian National Railways. It is of a type never before seen in Canada, and was produced by the CNR following surveys to determine the character of equipment and service sought by the travelling public.

Known as a 4-8-4 to railroaders, the car has four double bedrooms, eight duplex roomettes and four sections. New in design and style, it offers the ultimate in comfort and safety, and is part of CNR orders for 359 new passenger cars—the largest single purchase of passenger rolling stock in Canadian railway history. This new equipment will soon be seen on CNR trains in all sections of Canada.

In the new model, two bedrooms may be converted into one large room by folding the partitions and making adjoining rooms en suite. The beds disappear completely during daytime travel into recesses in the wall and ceiling. Arm chairs may be moved to any position in the room.

For midday (lower photograph) there are stylish dressing tables and china washbasins installed in the bedrooms. A twist of the pre-selector control and a touch of the foot valve provides water at any desired temperature. Each room has its own private toilet annex.

The eight duplex roomettes, with sofa seats and full size beds, are in alternating aisle and upper levels at one end of the car. At the opposite end, the "new look" has been carried to the familiar section space. Ladders set up each night with upper berths make it no longer necessary to ring for the porter to step up or down.

The cars, featuring for the first time the new CNR exterior colors of green, black and gold with the red maple leaf monogram, are built of high strength alloy steel and equipped with the latest safety braking devices. New type undercarriages with coil spring suspension, roller bearings and special anti-walt stabilizers ensure smooth riding. Air conditioning and cooling of drinking water is mechanical and eliminates the need to use natural ice.

The royal visitors begin three hectic days of engagements today. The Queen's first function in the morning will be to attend an investiture. Then, in quick succession she will receive delegations from Australian Commonwealth territories and review Papuan New Guinea troops who have made a special trip for this 30-minute ceremony.

Before she opens the Australian Parliament in the afternoon the Queen will receive the Commonwealth high commissioners and heads of other diplomatic missions to Australia. Tuesday is another day with formal engagements which will give her little time to relax—a meeting of the federal executive council, the unveiling of an Australian national memorial to America and an inspection of the Australian war memorial.

Wednesday's program includes a meeting of the privy council and the swearing in of councillors, the presentation of new colors to the corps of a staff cadets at Dunroon, a suburb of Canberra, a garden party in the afternoon and a ball at night.
