GRACE WELDON.
—OR—
FREDERICA, THE BONNET-GIRL.
CHAPTER XXII.—Continued.

THE VISIT.
‘You called this young girl’s name Frederica.’
‘I think I know now, who it is, and you have no cause for rivalry. It is the person I suspect, it is Daily’s half sister. I have heard lately that he had a confoundingly handsome half-sister who was a milliner. And, but for other matters on hand I should have tried to make her acquaintance, for love of the brother.’
‘Dare to think or speak of her lightly, Mr. Ellery, and I—’
‘You are too fiery and quick to take offence altogether. The young woman is Daily’s sister.’
‘No; she is no relation to him. She is not adopted by the mother. I am sure of this, for I inquired of Mrs. Daily herself while purchasing handkerchiefs at her counter. I had heard she was a sister, as you have believed she was, and this I do not believe he loves her. He had no other person in his heart than Grace.’
‘I am satisfied he likes this person better than care he should. Besides, I have seen his accursed lip press her cheek, and this I can never forgive. The man shall no more stand in my way than in yours.’
Ellery laughed lightly at Clow’s determined manner, and said,
‘What will you do? You would not kill him?’
‘No. I would only destroy him so far that he shall be his hell. I would not kill a man, I would be avenged upon. Oh, no! This would be full as great as hanging. When my enemy is dead, how can he suffer? how can I injure, torture, glut my vengeance? I might as well forgive him as kill him; for dead, I should cease to hate, and he to feel. No, no; he shall live—but degraded!’
‘What a devil in hatred you are, Clow!’
‘Have you and revenge are not monopolies for the white race,’ answered Clow, derisively. ‘James Daily having suffered enough to save yours, must now suffer to glut mine. It is not enough for me that he has been degraded in the estimation of our man; the man Philip Clow hated must be degraded and infamous to the world, blackened with every crime which an honest man would abhor. I love the young girl, I saw him fold to his heart; I love her with mad passion. No power on earth shall prevent me from making her my bride; and you be to the man who stands in my path. Daily, I can never forgive for what I have seen. Rejected by Grace Weldon he will give his heart, if he has not done so yet, to this lovely girl beneath his own mother’s roof.’
‘Do not fear; Daily will be sure to quit Boston at once. He has too much pride to remain when he would be likely to meet every day with Mr. Weldon or Grace. But have your own way, Philip. I shall be the last man to plead in behalf of Daily.’
‘You are not yet sure that he has been degraded by Mr. Weldon.’
‘I have ascertained it since I saw you to-day, and in this artful way. Our firm had occasion to purchase some sugars, and knowing Weldon had just received a cargo, I went to his counting-room to see on what terms he would sell. I entered boldly, and with a business air. It was just before sunset, and full five hours since Daily left, during which time he had not been in, as I learned from one of the younger clerks I met at the head of the wharf.’
‘We have the sugars and will let you have them for so and so,’ answered Mr. Weldon.
‘Did he look as if he suspected?’
‘Not at all. There is no fear of that. He believes Daily as guilty as we could desire to have him; he is assured of that, my good Philip. I bargained for the sugars, and in course of conversation I said, by way of feeling his pulse, ‘If you should not be in when we need for the sugars, will you leave orders with Mr. Daily to deliver them.’
‘Mr. Daily is no longer with me,’ he answered, with embarrassment, looking pale and red in the same moment.
‘I betrayed my surprise, but he said nothing more, and as I knew very well why he was no longer with him, I did not betray myself by any needless inquiries. So I merely answered that I was very sorry, that Mr. Daily was an excellent young man and a promising merchant, and hoped he would do well; adding, ‘whoever has had with them will have an invaluable head clerk.’
‘What did Mr. Weldon say to this?’
‘He slightly shook his head, made no reply for a moment or two, and then said,
‘It is probable Mr. Daily will not go into business again in this city as a clerk with any one.’
‘Did he say this?’
‘The very words, and in a manner that satisfied me he had privately discharged him, and bade him leave the city for fear of consequences.’
‘Then there is no doubt that so far you have been successful. You must now leave him to me. Before three days his disgrace shall be known publicly. It is necessary it should be known, or suspicion by-and-by may fasten upon us. We must bait it abroad, till Mr. Weldon will be compelled to arrest him to satisfy the public clamor. In his conviction rests only our security.’
‘That is true. But you must be very guarded that the rumor is not traced to you. Daily himself knows he is innocent. He will therefore be on the watch for the clue to the real actors. If he can trace a rumor up to you or me, he will promptly fasten upon us the crime, for he knows that no one could circulate a story that he did what he never did, but those who themselves did what is charged upon him. You understand me?’
‘Yes. And I see I must use caution.’
‘We have everything to fear now from Daily. He will not rest, he is assured, till he finds out who are his enemies. I did intend to entrust him in a gambling room and then send Weldon there. But let him pass. We can’t be too wary. As to you fearing a rival in him, I doubt it.’
‘That is my affair, not yours.’
‘Take care of it then, and keep it your affair. I would like much to see the fair maid who has captivated your heart, Philip. Nay, don’t look daggers—I mean no harm. I have as much as I can do to win Grace Weldon’s good will. So don’t fear me. Come. Let us not dally here. I must see the beautiful Jewess.’
‘Grace Weldon is to be won. Why do you dally here?’ asked Clow, sarcastically.
‘Grace and the Jewess. To this I give my heart; to the other, by-and-by, my hand. Adieu.’
They sprang into a cab in waiting; Philip drew the curtains too closely, and after a drive of many rods and windings they alighted before a door of a handsome brick house in one of the numerous ‘Courts’ or ‘Places’ characteristic of Boston. The steps were marble, and two white columns supported a neat architrave above them. Philip rang at the door, which was opened by a young white girl with an exceedingly fair skin and blue eyes.

‘Is Mademoiselle in?’ asked Clow.
‘Yes, sir,’ answered the girl, with great deference, and opened wide the door for them to enter. A lighted hall richly carpeted and hung with pictures received them.
‘We will leave our cloaks here. The lady is in the drawing-room above stairs,’ said Clow.
Ellery gazed round in silent surprise upon the elegance of every thing which met his eyes, and followed Clow up the softly carpeted stair-case to a semi-circular hall lighted by a beautiful chandelier. ‘This is a luxurious abode for a Jewish cantinaite,’ said Ellery, with surprise, mixed with pleasure and anticipation.
The mulatto made no answer, but throwing open a dark, polished mahogany door, which was ajar, he ushered him into an apartment richly and tastefully furnished and filled with a soft dreamy light like that produced by moon-beams intercepted by gauze curtains. To Ellery’s vision, coming in from the bright hall, the room appeared obscure at first, but by degrees he became accustomed to the mellow radiance that pervaded the place, and was enabled to discern objects distinctly, yet with wavy outlines. There was no person in the room that he could see. He had hardly entered when the door closed behind him, shutting out the glare from the chandelier in the hall. He looked around. The mulatto had disappeared. He had hardly time to feel surprise when his ears were arrested by low, soft notes of music, that came he knew not whence. They sounded afar, very far off, and to his imagination appeared to come from the most distant skies. Louder, sweeter, still it came, making his blood thrill and his heart to cease its beating. He stood transfixed like one entranced. Whether the music was vocal or instrumental he could not tell; whether in the room or in heaven. He was bewildered, and for a moment questioned his own waking identity. Nearer and clearer, yet still soft and melodious, like the tones of a harp and a human voice flowing together, as meeting rivulets mingle their waters, it swelled around him, till his senses were overpowered, when suddenly it ceased.
‘This is wonderful. It must be human, for I am not superstitious enough to believe in the supernatural,’ he said, waiting to hear it again. ‘It must be the fair Jewess, who has prepared for me this surprise. What a voluptuous light pervades this apartment! its source as invisible as that of the melody that I have just heard! I will vain seek the fair performer.’
He moved softly over the gorgeous Bigelow carpet, and approached a door ajar. It opened into a small boudoir, where, seated at a glittering harp, he discovered, by the soft light of the place, the beautiful quadroon, Isabel. She was in an attitude of once captivating and commanding. Her graceful fingers rested upon the chords, and her superb figure, slightly bent forward, displayed her noble form to the highest advantage. Her black, lustrous eyes were raised an instant to those of the intruder, and then dropped modestly to the floor, while she started with confusion, and half rose, as if surprised.
‘Pardon me,’ said Ellery, embarrassed by her presence and matchless beauty, and feeling the awkwardness of his situation; ‘but—’
‘No apology is necessary, sir,’ she said, in tones and with a smile of thrilling power. ‘If you are the guest whom Signor de — was to introduce, you are welcome.’

CHAPTER XXIII.
THE QUADROON.
The plot laid for the rich young man was as successful, so far as it progressed, as Philip Clow’s ambitious views could desire. Ellery was completely fascinated by the beauty and wit, and seeming partiality for himself, of the handsome operating-singer. He surrendered his senses to the bewitching charm of her presence, and when the mulatto, who, invisibly, had overlooked the whole interview, came into the boudoir, after the lapse of half an hour, Carlton turned to him, and said warmly,
‘Signor, in making me acquainted with this charming person, you have conferred on me a favor I can never return. Must I leave you now, fair Signora?’
‘Signora will soon have to go to the opera-house, and we had best withdraw, Mr. Ellery,’ said Clow.
‘Adieu, then, charming Signora,’ said Carlton, kissing his hand. ‘Adieu, till I see you at the opera, there again to listen to that sweet voice which has entranced my senses.’
With this gallant speech Ellery took his leave, and with the mulatto descended the hall stairs. When they had reached the cab, Clow said, quietly,
‘Mr. Ellery, how were you pleased?’
‘Pleased!’ he repeated, with animation. ‘I was, delighted—fascinated! I never beheld so lovely a person. And such eyes! They are magnificent! Such teeth. They are pearls—rich clusters of pearls! Such a voice. It is music in every accent! And her figure! How superb! She is certainly the most beautiful person I ever beheld!’
‘I know you would be as pleased with her at home as you were, on the stage,’ said the mulatto, concealing his deep feeling of gratification under a tone of quietude.
‘How kind you were to leave me to have the interview with her alone. No introduction either; and yet she received me with kindness and grace!’
‘She was prepared for your visit.’
‘So she said. What a luxurious abode she has. She has exquisite taste, and has every thing very elegant and recherche.’
‘Then you are pleased with her?’
‘Infatuated! Where was her father?’
‘Her father?’
‘Yes, the old Signor.’
‘Oh, ah! I was down stairs with him talking about the opera.’
‘He knew I was with his charming daughter?’
‘Yes.’
‘Then he is not jealous of her?’
‘Signor de — knows that he can have confidence in whoever I introduce.’
‘I envy your position with him. I should like to know him.’
‘He does not speak English, and therefore seldom sees any one.’
‘And I do not speak Portuguese; so I must talk with his daughter.’
‘You do not expect to see her again?’
‘No.’
‘Certainly I do. Do you suppose, after I have had an introduction to so fair a creature, I can go away and forget it? No, no, Philip. The lovely Signora and I must be friends!’
‘I promised only to introduce you to her. I have performed my promise. You cannot see her again.’
‘Cannot?’ demanded Ellery, with angry surprise.
‘No, Mr. Ellery. Your notice of her would mar

her fair fame. Her reputation is all she possesses.’
‘An opera-girl’s reputation!’ repeated the young man, with a sneer.
‘I have told you she is noble and virtuous. She was not always an opera-girl. You know her history. Her blood is as noble as your own. Your acquaintance would dishonor her!’
‘This is plain speaking, Clow.’
‘You know it, as well as I, that it would. Did you see anything in her that was unbecoming a modest maiden?’
‘No. She seemed as pure as she was beautiful!’
‘She seemed what she is. You have seen her, and now forget her.’
‘Never!’

ALL CURES MADE EASY!
HOLLOWAY’S OINTMENT.
Bad Legs, Ulcerous Sores, Bad Breasts, and Old Wounds.
No description of wound, sore or ulcer can resist the healing properties of this excellent Ointment. The worst cases daily assume a healthy appearance whenever this medical agent is applied; and sound flesh springs up from the bottom of the wound, inflammation of the surrounding skin is arrested and a complete and permanent cure quickly follows the use of the ointment.
Piles, Fistulas, and Internal Inflammation
These distressing and weakening diseases may with certainty be cured by the sufferers themselves, if they will use Holloway’s Ointment, and closely attend to the printed instructions. It should be used with care, and applied at frequent intervals, until the disease is removed. A poultice of bread and water may sometimes be applied at bed time with advantage; the most scrupulous cleanliness must be observed. If those who read this paragraph will bring it under the notice of such of their acquaintances as it may concern, they will render a service that will never be forgotten, as a cure is certain.

Rheumatism, Gout and Neuralgia.
Nothing has the power of relieving inflammation and subsiding pain in these complaints, as the ointment does, as follows:—
Apply the ointment to the part affected, and rub it in until it is thoroughly absorbed. It will remove all the morbid matter from the system, subside all inflammation and discharges from the joints, and remove all morbid humors, and unobstructed, and leave the sinews and muscles lax and uncontracted. A cure may always be obtained, even in the worst circumstances, if the use of these medicines be persevered in until a cure is effected.
Scrophulous, Sore Throat, Ringworm, and other Skin Diseases.
After foundation with warm water, the most relief and speediest cure can be readily obtained in all complaints affecting the skin and joints, by the simultaneous use of the Ointment and Pills. But it must be remembered that nearly all skin diseases indicate the depravity of the blood, and damage done to the liver and stomach, consequently, in many cases, it is necessary to purify the blood, which will be effected by a judicious use of the Pills. The general health will rapidly be improved, although the operation may be driven out more freely than before, and which should be promoted; perseverance is necessary.

Sore Throats, Diphtheria, Quinsey, Mumps, and all other Derangements of the Throat.
On the appearance of any of these maladies the Ointment should be well rubbed at least three times a day upon the neck and upper part of the chest, as to penetrate to the glands, is said to be forced into them; this course will at once remove inflammation and ulceration. The worst cases will yield to this treatment by following the printed directions.
Scrophulous or King’s Evil and Swelling of the Glands.
This class of cases may be cured by Holloway’s purifying Pills and Ointment, as a matter of course, by rubbing the blood and strengthening the system renders them more amenable than any other remedy for all complaints of a scrophulous nature. As the blood is impure, the stomach and bowels being much deranged, require purifying medicine to bring about a cure.

Bad Legs, Chills, Piles, Skin-diseases, Ulcerous Sores, Bad Breasts, Gout, Rheumatism, Sore-throats, Burns, Chapped Hands, Swellings, Scoury, Itches of the Face, Corns (Soft), Lumbago, Sore-heads, Cuts, Bruises, Sprains, Stiff Joints, Rheumatism, Ulcers, Coochy, Elephantiasis, Scalds, Yaws, Wounds.
Sold at the Establishment of Peterson, Holloway, 224 Strand, (near Temple Bar), London; and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the civilized world, at the following prices—1s. 6d., 2s., 3s., 4s., 6s., 12s., 20s., and 30s. each Box.
