

GRACE WELDON.

THE MULLATO AND HIS SISTER.

Isabel, said Philip, after a few moments silence, 'you cannot sympathize and feel with me as I would have you.'

'Nay, Philip, I have one feeling with you, on this subject,' she said, earnestly. 'Do not reproach me thus.'

'Well, I am glad you say so. If you act not with me, who will you cooperate with? Are you a mulattress? Do you belong to the herd of slaves that hide in the cities' alleys, and live by the lowest vocations? Are you one of them? No! You were, but are not now. Are you then a white maiden? Can you sit on cushions in the broad aisle of their proud temples, and worship? Can you mingle in the dances with them? Can you even be admitted to their boarding schools? Are you one of them, I ask? No. There are the two great sides. You belong to neither; nor do I. We stand alone. We have cast off the one, and are not received by the other. But this shall not always be. I have sworn that they shall receive both you and me. They will not do it frankly, and therefore they shall be deceived into it, and I will obtain right by stratagem and plotting—by art, cunning, and duplicity. I hate them; but yet I would lose my left hand—aye, my arm to its very shoulder, to have the other hand openly, frankly, and equally taken by men of the white race.'

'I would scorn them, brother!' answered the young girl, proudly throwing forward her head in a very spirited manner.

'I do scorn and despise them; yes, I tell you, sister, I would fawn upon them—nay, I could lap the dust from their feet if I could be taken up by them the next moment and treated as a man. But fawn I never will, for this will never come by fawning. I will gain it by art, and money, and power, and stratagem. You, too, must aid in the work.'

'What would you have me to do?' she asked, with surprise, and looking perplexed, seeing that he fixed his gaze on her as if expecting her to make some reply.

'What would I have you to do? Do you know for what I have educated you?'

'To have the pride of knowing you could render your sister equal to the daughter of the white race.'

'More than this; though when I look on you, and converse with you, and reflect what you are—when I see in you the fruits of my labors and the realization thus far, of my hopes, I am proud. But more than this. I have, by educating you, forever placed you beyond the reach of every female of your race, and forever erected a barrier to your descent to their level. You, neither I nor you, can remain between two elements; if too buoyant to sink into the one, we must rise into the other. You can never be the servant of a white maiden, and must therefore be an equal.'

'Why, then, have you placed me, the last three weeks, at Mrs. Anson's?' she asked, with a look of curiosity.

'You were not there as a servant, but to learn a reputable trade; not that I wished either that you should learn a trade; but it was a fashionable resort, and I wished to test you in the presence of the ladies who came in. I wished you to be seen, I wished you to attract notice and remark. I wished to pave the way for your introduction into that society I mean you shall yet move in; for you are fitted, both in person and mind, in address and accomplishments, to grace any circle in the metropolis. Of this you are conscious. What artist paints so exquisitely? What performer on the harp or piano plays with more skill? What Italian singer ever poured forth such melody from her throat as flows from yours, with such ravishing sweetness and power? No, Isabel, my sister, I placed you not there to servitude and apprenticeship, but to surprise the ladies of fashion who daily thronged the saloon of Madam Anson! No one knew your talents, and powers, and accomplishments, but your masters, who knew not, when they secretly taught you in your retired apartments, that their pupil was a mulattress—a despised daughter of the negro race. No, forsooth, they took you, as you well know, for a Jewess. Had I told the truth, would I have got such masters for you as I obtained? Would they have degraded their art, each to communicate it to a mulattress, think you? Oh, no. It was by concealing the stain of your birth that I achieved all I did. Even Madam Anson objected to taking you when I told her—for I cared not to disguise it to her,—that it was my sister I wanted to place with her. But she was in my power—she owed me money—and the creditor's power is the greatest and most fearful power on earth. She was in my power, and she obeyed my wish. I did not explain to you my object in placing you with her, because I would rather have you act out naturally your part. You have done it well, for I have heard of you as well as watched you. Your name and beauty—ay, be not confused—are in a hundred mouths; and not only of the proud and beautiful of your own sex, but of the young, rich and select, of the opposite one. But no one knows you, nor whence you came. This secret Madam Anson has kept, as I ordered. The very mystery thrown around you has increased the interest in you; and to-day I heard, as I entered a coffee-house in my Portuguese character—I heard a discussion between two fashionable young men, whether you were a quadroon or a Jewess; while both repeated much that they had heard of your beauty, talents, and education.'

Isabel looked embarrassed, but it was evident that she felt gratified, as well as the sensation she had unconsciously created, as by the flattering commendations of her brother.

'I was, indeed, much talked to, and a great many questions were put to me, by beautiful girls, and even gentlemen who came in with their pressed their conversation upon me; till I became so much annoyed and even alarmed,' she added, with a brilliant smile, 'that I told Madam I would for the future keep in the rear shop or up stairs; and after that I remained away from sight, while I was at work, all I could; but I was not aware of your purposes, Philip. What end do you have, or had you in view, in making me so conspicuous?'

'I will explain to you, know first, however, that my object has been thus far successful, as you shall now hear; for I will conceal from you nothing.'

CHAPTER XI.

THE MULLATO SCAMP.

The mulatto, before proceeding to unfold his plans to his sister for her aggrandizement, rose from his chair, and took several turns up and down the room, with the step and air of a man undecided precisely how to broach the subject upon his mind. At length he threw himself upon a sofa, and said, in a subdued undertone: 'I shall

'Isabel, come here!'

She rose, and sat by his side in silence. He took her hand in his, and gazing into her face, said, 'I need not tell you, sister, that you are very dear to me. I need not assure you that I love you better than any thing else on earth! Do you wish me to assure of this?'

'No, brother; I know you love me!'

'You do not always feel that I do. The reception you gave me to-night, at the mantuamaker's, was cold, and almost degrading.'

'Because I believed you had placed me there because you had been angry with me for insisting that you should no more appear in two characters; one, especially, so low as that you assume at home by day.'

'That which you call assumed, is real! What do I seem to be when I assume this?' he asked, with a scornful curl of his thin upper lip.

'You appear like one of the degraded class you so heartily despise.'

'Appear! No, that is my real character, sister. I am a mulatto, and one of the degraded class I despise. As you see me now,' he said, surveying his fashionably-dressed person, his well-arranged black locks, his mustached lip, and luxuriant whiskers, 'as you behold me now, you see me in my assumed character.'

'No, this is natural! Education has made a gentleman of you, dear brother,' she said, with enthusiasm.

'Education! A gentleman! I could laugh at your unmeaning words, did I not feel them so bitterly. Education has made me a curse to myself. Instead of making me a gentleman, it has only rendered my degradation more marked! It has made me feel, with keenest sensitiveness, my debased position, and—but I will say no more! I cannot speak of this. By-and-bye I shall act! I wish now to talk with you. But, touching the low shop I choose to keep, and the low character I choose at times to fall back upon—at present I cannot give them up! My shop is a mark—and, under my humble avocation, as that of Clow, the mulatto's restaurant, I have a cloak for all the various business that I transact. My shop is a barrier between me and the law. Few that know me as Felipe Silva, the foreigner, know me as Philip Clow, the taverner! Of these few, one is dead, and the others will keep my secret. Not even my own bar-keeper, should he meet me in my own passage, when I go forth as de Silva, would know I was his master! Yes, his master! I am his master; and he is white, and I am—a black!'

'Brother, you are fairer than many men I have—'

'St! I have heard of white negroes—Albinos they call them; white even to the hair and eyelashes. Yet were they less negroes? But let that pass. By-and-bye I shall have but one character. At present I must have two. Hear what I have to say. You are assured that I seek your good!'

'Yes, Philip.'

'I do. I used say nothing to awaken your pride or ambition! I know what you feel in reference to your degradation from the accident of birth. Now, I have a plan by which you can avenge yourself upon the haughty race that deride such pretensions as ours. You are wondrously beautiful! Dark as you are, your beauty will command admiration every where! But these men who admire you would degrade you, and make you the slave of their passions! They would, and will, look upon you only as a rare prize for their lusts! And why? because you are of the race you are! They will allow no virtue in its maidens, no honor in its men! He who could ruin you, would boast of it in the halls of dissipation, and in the walks of fashion! But your destiny is to be different from that of the daughters of our grovelling race! I have told you why I took you from the retirement and profound seclusion in which I have kept you, since I saw the first dawning forth of that beauty which I now behold in its maturity. I foresaw its power. The time has now come when it should be wielded with all its effect. Will you second me in any project to place you in a position to which your education and beauty entitle you?'

'I will, Philip,' she answered earnestly, her dark eyes lighting up.

'While you were at madam's, you were seen by a young gentleman, who has spoken to me of you, not knowing who you were, but supposing you, as others have done, to be a Jewess. One of my motives in placing you there, was, that he might see you under those circumstances first. I knew the man so well, that I was persuaded when the rumor of your beauty, and the mystery thrown around you by the silence preserved by Madam Anson, reached him, as I intended it should, at all events, that he would go to see you. Your beauty ensnared him!'

'Who was he, brother?' asked Isabel, quickly.

'He is a young man who is heir to one of the largest fortunes in the city, and who belongs to the most aristocratic blood of New England! You shall soon see him. This man I have destined to be your husband!'

'My husband!' she cried, with a look of surprise.

'Yes.'

'A stranger! A white man!' responded Philip, with inimitable irony.

'Nay, he is of the proudest blood of your race!'

'I cannot marry a man I do not love!'

'Thou must learn to love him—for he is to be thy husband, and you are to be his wife!'

'But does he consent to this strange union?'

'Consent! No, no; not yet—not yet,' answered the mulatto, with a scornful smile. 'He knows nothing yet of my plan. Within three days you shall see him.'

'Where?'

'Not here; for he must not know that you and I are one in blood. He must not suspect that we are at all known, one to the other. I shall leave it to you, when he does see you again, to follow up your conquest! You must so fascinate and bewilder his senses, that he shall become your very slave. You possess the power to do what you will with him, or any gay man of the world. You must act with the skill of a fisher, and use every glance, and smile, and word, as links of a chain with which you are to bind him! You must remember you are to gratify both revenge against the race, and your ambition to be raised to their level! This idea must not leave your thoughts for a moment. Be faithful to yourself—to me, and you will be successful. This man that you must learn to love—or assume to love, I hate, Isabel; for he has, more than once, shown his contempt for me and my race, though I was doing him service; and I will never forgive him until I am avenged, by making my sister his wife! You see that I have many and strong motives; but I need not press them. You know what I require.'

'But I have never seen him, Philip. Besides, it is so haughtily despises our race, I begin already to hate with you. How, then, do you command me to love him?'

'You must act a part. I care not whether you love him or no, so that you achieve the object I have in view! He is handsome, accomplished, and as I have said, white and aristocratic, and will one day be wealthy; though now he is something loose and dissipated.'

'I will see what I can do,' she answered. 'Oh, did I know and love this person, then how cheerfully should I enter into your wishes!'
