ELLEN'S DIARY

Nations Of The World Mourn A Mutual Loss

"The messages of sympathy continue to pour into Washington" an announcer says of the tragic happening which has so saddened the world: the assassination of the President of that great nation, our neighbor across the line to the South. That the man, John F. Kennedy, himself matched his country in greatness, that he set an admirable image of a clear and resolute mind, of courage and sincerity, makes the loss, we think more grievous...

We remember now how sorrowful were the faces of those on the streets of great American cities as shown on TV, how women who had probably never so much as spoken personally to him, or felt the warmth of his handshake, wept openly as though it had been one of their own household, someone very near and dear to them who had been suddenly and shockingly taken from them by death.

He was — for the expression on a face is bound sometime to reflect in a flash ones innermost thoughts, good or not so good — a likeable friendly man, sympathetic always to the needs of the common folks, of whom his illustrious predecessor in office, the rugged, kindly-hearted Lincoln once said: "God must have loved them too, for He made so many of them!"

We recall that in that bygone time, as in this instance, folks came sadly also "To lay a wreath on murdered Lincoln's bier."

And now a world close-knit by science, its far ends as near now as the home-community, drawn together also in a mutual loss, mourn the untimely tragic passing of a President of a vast and strong nation, whose life and living exemplified all those ideals and virtues that are good.

"Why?" we reflect. "Why did this calamity happen?"

It could be, the thought comes, because a man ill in mind, troubled by distraction, surely over the borderline of sanity, had not received the care and treatment he required to through the years.

In years to come Island folks will recall the homey items of this sad November day (the 22nd.) placing the date of some birth perhaps or other happening of their living definitely because "That was the day President Kennedy died, don't you remember?"

For us at Alderlea, especially for the little family in the house across the lane whose daughter she is, it will be recalled that this was the day the one girl of the place returned from her college in Fredericton.

This evening, it was, obviously pleased to have been so privileged to have had this excursion with Quite a few of us traveling by plane. And having seen so much and enjoyed everything so well, it will, we can appreciate, take days to recount the whole story. And we are happy for her and the young company who have homed safely and well.

The dusk came down. The moon climbed. The stars shone, following old courses. No change there. But since mourning for millions world-over, happiness has changed to mourning. The President of the United States of America is dead.

Until tomorrow — Diary

MARY HAWORTH

Relatives Have Priority If Guest List Is Limited

Dear Mary Haworth: I am the mother of the bridegroom and need advice desperately. I have been allotted a specified number of invitations to my son's wedding. We have a very large family that includes many uncles, aunts and second cousins.

They have always been invited to our family celebrations and we have always been invited to theirs. Otherwise we never see each other.

Now we have many friends who have known our son since his birth, whom we see often. To whom is our obligation? Should I invite the relatives whom we see only on special occasions? Or the friends whom we see regularly? Please answer immediately? E.S.

Dear E.S.: Speaking in terms of customary social usage, your problem as presented hardly makes sense.

Here's why: It is the prerogative, in fact the responsibility (supposedly) of the bride's family to stage the wedding, issue the invitations and foot the bills.

In drafting the guest list, the bride's mother (or the bride herself) asks the man's family to provide names of persons to be asked from his side of the fence. Presumably relatives and friends are eligible.

Both mothers and-or the engaged pair usually get their heads together to arrive at a fair allocation of space.

If, for financial or other reasons, the bride's family is not fit to limit the guest list, so that the man's family can't possibly ask 35 kinsmen and 60 dear friends, then the bride's family has a duty to take the bull by the horns and shoulder the blame, figuratively, for leaving the groom's family out if they should have been included.

How to do this in a mannerly way? The customary procedure is for the bride's family to make it clear from the start that the wedding will be a small-scale event, to which "family only" will be invited. That means his kinsmen and hers, on both sides of the aisle.

Essentially a wedding ceremony is an ingathering of kinsmen and neighbors, to witness the truth that a man and a woman are pledging themselves to the unity of marriage, in the sight of God. And by virtue of inviting these "dearly beloved," the couple is implicitly asking communal support of the contract.

It is nice if neighbors and friends as well as kinsmen can be present to affirm such support. But if the realities of the situation can't accommodate all, then I should think that kinsmen hold the inside track. H.M.

Dear Mary Haworth: Apropos the touching letter from the housewife, 21, gnealy worried about her harsh impatience with her two babies, I am struck by one sentence that you over looked, apparently.

She says "I am on nerve pills which don't seem to help." As an allergy specialist I was put on nerve pills, and one type of pill prescribed for this almost had me climbing the walls.

Possibly her nerve pills are doing more harm than good, without her doctor's knowing it; especially if it is a tranquilizer pill, which has a reverse effect on many people. Is she more nervous since taking nerve pills? Has she mentioned this to her doctor? These questions should be considered. F.S.

Dear F.S.: Could be that doctor and patient need this reminder to double - check the point you raise. Thanks for the suggestion. M.H.

Taste Old-Time Flavor Of New England Dinner

THE FIRST authentic New England Baked Beans were undoubtedly canned in Portland, Maine, by a method that produced baked beans of old-time flavor.

Juicy salt pork and a sauce of brown sugar and spices (made from a century - old recipe) slowly penetrate each and every bean while baking until they reach golden perfection and are sealed in tins or glass service - pots to hold their freshness, flavor and firmness.

Every morning at 8.30 the officials of this firm meet to taste-test the previous day's pack.

Previously, all raw beans were inspected by women workers who "looked them over" (as we still do for home cooking) to be sure that all small stones and other foreign material were removed — a long, tiresome process.

New Type Of Sorting

But along came the development of electronics and a new and ingenious type of bean-sorting was invented.

The company on Casco Bay in Portland, Maine, was the first to install this device, in which each individual bean is inspected from all sides by an arrangement of electronic eyes at a rate of 200 million beans a day. If a single bean deviates from standard, it is electronically rejected — part of the contribution science is making to fine processed foods.

Canned New England Brown Bread and authentic Baked Indian Pudding are baked in the brick ovens of this old firm. And dozens of fine fresh Maine vegetables, a group of excellent New England meat, chicken and vegetable stews, corn relish and other foods are prepared and processed and are widely on sale nationwide.
