ACQUIRED TRAITS.

A group of ladies and gentlemen who had listened to a paper on a science subject in a private parlor cornered a person addicted to science to settle a disputed question. He did not think acquired traits are ever transmitted.

"There are one legged men enough in this country to support several cork leg establishments, yet never has the child of a one legged man been born with less than two. Certain characteristics of the parent the child may have. It may be a conical-ly exact reproduction. Always, however, it is the natural and not the acquired peculiarities of the parent or other ancestor that it shows. Hence Professor Weissman argues that acquired qualities or characteristics are never transmitted.

"The operations of the laws of heredity are strange enough. A child may not resemble either parent, but it may be an exact likeness of a remote ancestor. That has been a source of scandal at times. A Baltimore man, a man of wealth, married a beautiful sewing girl. When a black child was born to her, there was trouble. Then it was revealed that her mother was a mulatto. There is an older case exactly like it. A Greek married a fair slave girl, and when she gave birth to a black child her blood was traced back to an African.

"There are persons who think that if a man makes himself, say, a great linguist his children will be more likely to have the gift of tongues. They think the children born to a parent after he has become dissipated are more liable than the children born earlier to inherit a taste for drink. These things Weissman denies. In the first case the children may have the father's aptitude for languages, but not the stronger because he used it. In the other case the children may have the parent's disposition that led him to drink, but not the stronger because it was indulged.

"Mr. Herbert Spencer regards the question whether any acquired traits are ever inherited as a great matter, but he has not made up his opinion yet. He is not prepared to combat the new theory.

"The long accepted theory has never been quite satisfactory. It leaves so much unaccounted for. If acquired qualities are inherited, the world ought to be crowded with greatness. Yet it is notorious that few great men leave sons as great. Although education is within the reach of all and the methods of education are the product of centuries of experience, Shakespeares and Miltons and Napoleons are not common yet.

"On the other hand, we might expect a steady increase of drunkards if acquired propensities are transmitted. As a matter of fact, there is much less drunkenness than there was half a century ago, although the pressure of modern life and an irritable condition of the nerves are calculated to promote dissipation.

"The later doctrine does not deny the importance of heredity. It does not make it less important for the parent to lead an upright and careful life, since his children are influenced by his example, though they do not inherit his mental and physical acquisitions as they may his property. If acquired traits are inherited, it should be easy to prove. It has not been proved."—Washington Post.

A Verbal Confusion.

The hall was empty, but the door was not locked, and the citizen from the country walked in. It was late in the afternoon when he arrived, and almost dark when a brisk young man came in, and after a few desultory remarks concerning the methods of janitors, lit the gas and began to move the piano around. The countryman arose and shuffled his feet so as to attract attention.

"Did you wish to see me?" asked the young man.

"Yes, sir," was the answer. "That is to say, I think it was you as I wished to see. But not never havin seen you before, so's to be sure, I couldn't exactly say."

"Do you wish to join our organization?" "No," was the answer in tones of increasing doubt. "I don't want to get into the stock company. All I want is to get a hired man to do chores."

"But, sir, this is not an intelligence office."

"He doesn't have to be intelligent. The trouble with the last one was that he knewed too much."

"I don't believe we can accommodate you," the other remarked as he turned around and resumed shoving the piano.

"Now, look here, young man. I didn't come here to rile you, ar. I don't want you to rile me. I'm willin to go into any arrangement you want to make fur gettin them there chores off my hands. When I seen your sign I says to myself, 'There's an institution that knows a long felt want when it sees it an order be encouraged.' That sign of your'n, sir, may be your personal property, but it hain't got no right to mislead people."

"But, my dear sir, our sign has nothing to do with chores."

"What's the reason? There it is as plain as day—c-h-o-r-e-s—a society of a choral society ain't a society fur lookin after chores will you have the politeness to tell me what it is fur?"—Washington Star.
