

U.N. Salvage Fleet Gets Down To Work On Canal

FERDAN, Egypt AP—The UN salvage fleet buckled down Wednesday to clearing five areas of sunken ships and other debris of war.

The 160-ton Suez Canal Company tug Adria was hauled up from the bed of Port Said harbor by a huge floating crane and fitted with hoses to pump her dry.

About 24 miles down the canal two UN-chartered salvage vessels—the Italian tug Hercules and the Swedish ship Herakle—started clearing the wreckage at kilometers.

A flotilla headed by West Germany's Energie and Ausdauer, the world's largest salvage vessels, tied up at the wrecked Ferdan bridge, 51 miles south of Port Said, for piecemeal removal of that huge obstruction. Italian diver, Bruno Sontina led off by tying wire cables to parts of the wreckage.

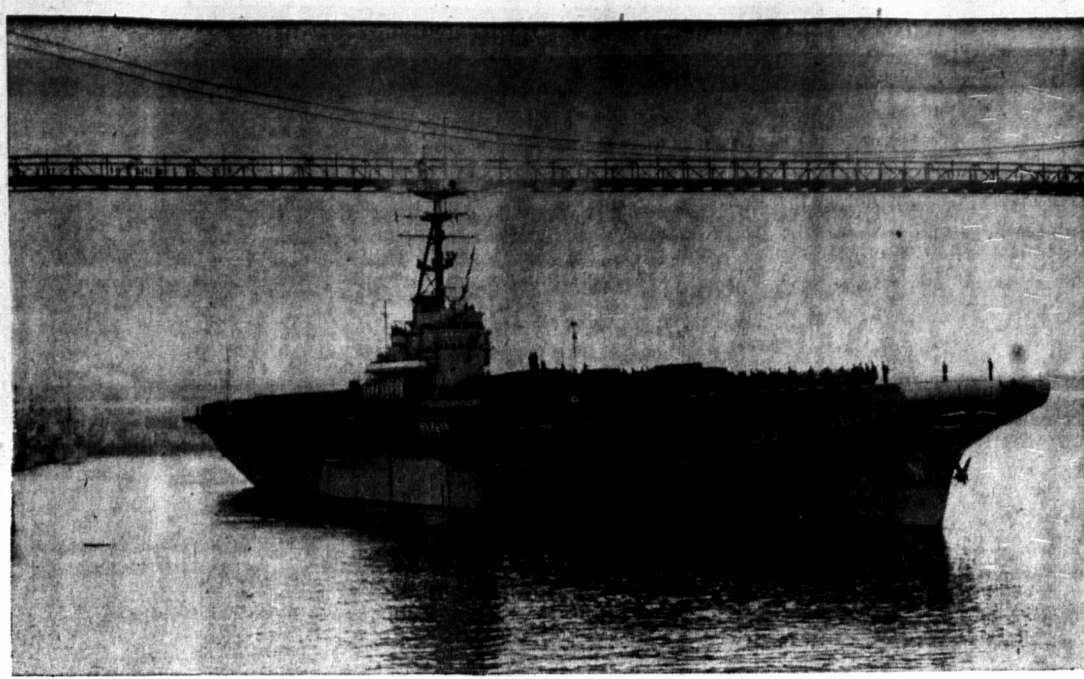

CEMENT SHIP TOUGH

The Italian floating winch Squalo, which has a shallow draft, managed to skim past the Ferdan bridge and on down to Lake Tim-sah.

There the Egyptian ship Akka, which went down laden with cement, presents one of the toughest jobs in the clearance operation. Lt. Gen. Raymond A. Wheeler, the UN Salvage director, hopes by early March to have a channel sufficiently deep to take oil tankers and other craft up to about 10,000 tons.

On down the 103-mile-long waterway, salvage crews labored to remove three hulks corking the southern entrance. Work began at the southern end last Saturday.

Wheeler estimated Sunday the canal will be open in May to the largest type vessels adapted to its depth, 34 feet, three inches. It never could accommodate the monsters of Atlantic and Pacific commerce and many modern sup-
