POETRY.
THE CHILDREN.
FOUND IN THE DESK OF CHARLES DICKENS
AFTER HIS DEATH.

When the lessons and tasks are all ended,
And the school for the day is dismissed,
And the little ones gather around me To bid me 'good night' and be kissed; Oh, the little white arms that encircle My neck in a tender embrace!
Oh, the smiles that are halos of heaven, Shedding sunshine and love on my face!

And when they are gone I sit dreaming Of my childhood, too lovely to last;
Of love that my heart will remember, When it wakes to the pulse of the past.
Ere the world and its wickedness made me, A partner of sorrow and sin—When the glory of God was about me, And the glory of gladness within.

Oh! my heart grows as weak as a woman's And the fountain of feeling will flow; When I think of the paths steep and stony,
Where the feet of the dear ones must go;
Of the mountains of sin hanging o'er them,
Of the tempests of fate blowing wild; Oh! that's nothing on earth half so holy As the innocent heart of a child.

They are idols of hearts and households, They are angels of God in disguise—His sunlight still sleeps in their tresses, His glory still beams in their eyes.
Oh, these trunks that glare around me, They have made me more manly and mild,
And I know now how Jesus could liken The kingdom of God to a child.

Seek not a life for the dear ones All radiant, as others have done, But that life may have just as much shadow To temper the glare of the sun.
I would pray God to guard them from evil, But my prayer would bound back to myself.

Ah! a seraph may pray for a sinner, But a sinner must pray for himself.

The twig is so easily bent, I have banished the rule and the rod; I have taught them the goodness and knowledge,
They have taught me the goodness of God My heart is a dungeon of darkness, Where I shut them from breaking a rule; My frown is sufficient correction, My love is the law of the school.

I shall leave the old house in the autumn, To traverse its threshold no more; Ah! how I shall sigh for the dear ones That meet me each morn'g at the door.
I shall miss the "good nights" and the kisses,
And the gush of their innocent glee,
The group on the green and the flowers That are brought every morning to me.

It shall miss them at morn'g and at even,
Their song in the school and the street,
It shall miss the low hum of their voices,
And the tramp of their delicate feet.
When the lessons and tasks are all ended,
And death says the school is dismissed, May the little ones gather around me,
And bid me "good night" and be kissed.

LITERATURE.
WENDERHOLME.
A STORY OF LANCASHIRE AND
CHAPTER I.

So Jim went forth to meet them with a lantern, and old Sarah kept the supper warm.

Most women in Sarah's position would have had the consolation of a talk with some neighbour, who during the interval of waiting might have helped her to watch the juggled hare, and eliven her with the most recent news of the locality; but as it happened that Twistle Farm, where she now reigned as housekeeper to Mr. Isaac Ogden, a very well-to-do, middle-aged widower, was at least three miles from the nearest house, old Sarah was often compelled to hours of complete loneliness.

How a farmhouse could be so entirely isolated as this was requires a few words of explanation. Mr. Ogden, for reasons with which the reader will become acquainted in due time, and in conformity with the provisions of a recent Act of Parliament, had taken a fancy to enclose about thirty acres of land in the middle of a very extensive moor that belonged to his own family, and in consequence of his habits as a sportsman he knew every recognizable spot. The objects which he sought—and he had the strongest possible reasons for seeking them —were solitude and health, and as much of a total revolution in his habits of life as might be attained without entirely severing himself from the neighbouring valleys, where all his friends lived, and to which he was bound by the cords of a local attachment stronger, perhaps, than even he himself was aware of. Having chosen a place very precisely suited to his own needs, and therefore, as was natural, not so well suited to the needs of men less exceptionally situated, who and who severely criticised his taste, Isaac Ogden built a small but substantial house, with a barn attached to it, and stabling for three horses and as many cows. As pecuniary profit did not enter into his calculations, he had no intention of selling farm produce in any other shape than that of living animals, and both cows and horses were kept simply for the use of the little household. When, as would occasionally happen, there was an additional superfluity of milk, it was always absorbed by a kennel of four pointers and the prosperous inhabitant of the pigsty.

Old Sarah was too much accustomed to the place to feel any serious apprehension about the safety of her master, when, as on the present occasion, he had to come home in the dark. Besides, although the night was of the murkiest, it was only just ten o'clock, and there is a superstition about the hours more or less strongly affects all of us, and from which a woman in Sarah's position was not likely to be exempt.
From dusk till ten, however dark it is, there is nothing very terrible about the darkness and the consciousness that people are sitting cozily round cheerful fires encourages and supports us; but when the world's human inhabitants are asleep and darkness reigns not only in the eternal world but even in the abodes of men, there is something awful in the universality of it. If old Sarah had been accustomed to read for her amusement, she would have found the accomplishment of great value in her present situation; but, though not altogether ignorant of letters, she found it more convenient to do her reading by deputy, and her fellow-servant Jim, who read the Manchester paper when his master had done it, kept her acquainted with the principal events of the day—even with what she estimated in the following order: first the thunderstorms, then the murders, and finally the robberies and accidents.

Poor Sarah in her solitude had, however, a consolation which a tyrannical convention denies to women of higher social position, but which many of our male readers will fully appreciate. And now as Jim is gone, and she cannot see a plate or a pan in all the bright kitchen that offends even an eye so critical as hers, she takes down from the chimney-piece an oval leaden box, with a massive lid crowned with the resemblance of a man's head in a nightcap, and having selected a clean tobacco pipe of white clay, with a stem more than two feet long, fills it in a leisurely manner, and sits down to smoke—not in any common chair, but in sort of episcopal throne of polished oak, on the softest of cushions, under an oaken canopy, and with tall oak back and sides—an invention, in this case at least, not designed with any view to the maintenance of dignity, but simply as the best of all imaginable precautions against draughts. It had been a present to old Sarah from her master's mother, an elderly but remarkable woman, whose acquaintance she first made in due time, and who had thought it the most likely means of warding off some rheumatic or neuralgic pains in the shoulders and back of the neck from which the poor woman had been a sufferer, and which, it was thought, might be brought on by her habit of sitting with her back to the kitchen door that opened to the east, and never altogether excluded the biting wind that blows from that quarter of compass. Mrs. Ogden had carried her kindness so far as to make the cushion with her own hands; the upper side of it was composed of small hexagonal patches of various very rich old silks, with a sort of star of black velvet in the middle; and the lining was one piece of the most brilliant scarlet cloth.

Whilst Sarah was sitting in this chair of state, indulging in a luxury usually denied for her sex, and thus practically asserting the rights of women at a time when they were less openly advocated than now, her fellow servant Jim Henderson was making the best of his way with a lantern down a narrow, stony cart track, not yet worthy of the name of a road, which led over the wild moor, and finally lost itself on the slope of one of the minor hills or buttresses of the high country of the heather. The turf here was much more smooth and grassy than in the upper region; and an experienced carter, by taking his vehicle to the right or to the left, as occasion required, could keep its two wheels tolerably level with each other, notwithstanding the general steepness of the extensive slope. As there were no hags in
