

British Prosperity Made Spending Curbs Necessary

LONDON (Reuters)—R.A. Butler, chancellor of the exchequer, Tuesday denied Labor charges of economic bungling and said the spending curbs are "almost unrelieved" British prosperity.

"The economy is fundamentally sound and we have made a great surge forward," he told the Commons in a heated debate on his new economic moves, announced yesterday. The debate concluded with a vote of 290 to 231 in support of the government's economic policy.

He added that the reception given the new restrictions provided evidence the government has "found about the right balance" for Britain's economic situation.

Butler spoke in answer to the former Labor chancellor, Hugh Gaitskell, who charged the government with creating "an extraordinary muddle" of the nation's tough economic situation.

Butler's new restrictions are designed to cut down British imports and build up the export trade on which the country depends for survival. The measures included doubling the down payment in instalment buying of automobiles, refrigerators, television sets and other luxury goods.

Journies 10,000 Miles To Lose Pound Note

LONDON, (AP)—Gorge Shepherd reached London Tuesday after a 10,000-mile journey—just to drop a pound note on the sidewalk in Bayswater square.

For 48-year-old Shepherd, now a prosperous lumber dealer in Sarawak, it will be a sentimental act of remembrance.

During the depression he was walking through Bayswater square with only twopenny in his pocket. He found a pound note. His luck changed for the good.

"I hope someone who is as badly off now as I was before will find the note I drop," he said.
