Martin, Lewis Score In Uproarious Comedy Of GI Guys And Gals

Paramount's "At War With The Army" which opened today at the Prince Edward Theatre, is a riotous tale of army camp life that will have you rocking with laughter from start to finish.

The Eagles opened the game with a hard hitting attack, and although held back for a time by the locals they were not to be denied with Murphy scoring two and MacNeil one to put Georgetown up three.

The Meteors began to get the feel of things in the second period, and the year's recruit, A. Clements, led off the scoring. He was followed in succession by K. Clements, Power, MacLean, and Nelson.

Georgetown scored three more in this period with MacNeil leading to tie the score at 6-all at the end of the period.

The last period was the most rugged of all with everything going hard checking by both teams began to take its toll on the players as the game slowed up.

Lewis, with his off-beat grammar and Magic Putty pan, can turn the simplest piece of business into an earth-shaking farce, and as a ladie operator on the chow line, he makes a hilarious mess of the mess hall.

MONTAGUE UNITED W.M.S.

The W.M.S. of Montague United Church enjoyed a very pleasant evening when they met at the manse for their meeting on Tuesday evening, Dec. 18th.

A Canadian friendship carol service was very capably conducted by Mrs. L. A. Johnston, several members assisting in the candle light service, with Mrs. Douglas Coffin leading the Christmas carols.

After this program, which closed with prayer by the leader, the president, Mrs. Leon Johnston, took over the meeting. Roll call was answered by a scripture verse with the word "joy" or "joyful" in it.

The nominating committee brought in the following slate of new officers: President, Mrs. Ethel Stewart; 1st vice president, Mrs. Leon Johnston; 2nd vice president, Mrs. M. MacLean; secretary, Mrs. Charles Aiken; treasurer, Mrs. Lester MacLeod; Christian Stewardship, Mrs. L. A. Johnston; Missionary monthly, Mrs. Geo. Lake.

It was decided to have an announcement from the pulpit asking those who have mite boxes to bring them in.

Mrs. A. D. MacKenzie then told a beautiful Christmas story, the old story told a little differently. The benediction was pronounced and refreshments served and a pleasant half hour enjoyed.

Montague In 10-6 Win Over Geo'town Eagles

Coming from behind a three-goal deficit, the Montague Meteors defeated the Georgetown Eagles 10-6 last night in a fast, rugged game at the Montague rink.

The Eagles opened the game with a hard hitting attack, and although held back for a time by the locals they were not to be denied with Murphy scoring two and MacNeil one to put Georgetown up three.

The Meteors began to get the feel of things in the second period, and the year's recruit, A. Clements, led off the scoring. He was followed in succession by K. Clements, Power, MacLean, and Nelson.

Georgetown scored three more in this period with MacNeil leading to tie the score at 6-all at the end of the period.

The last period was the most rugged of all with everything going hard checking by both teams began to take its toll on the players as the game slowed up.

Lewis, with his off-beat grammar and Magic Putty pan, can turn the simplest piece of business into an earth-shaking farce, and as a ladie operator on the chow line, he makes a hilarious mess of the mess hall.

The large number of fans were well pleased with the game which was the opener in Montague. Unfortunately the ice was still wet from an earlier flood which slowed the game considerably.

The Birthday Murder

CHAPTER FORTY Part Two

Victoria saw with vague surprise that Moira Hastings' face was screwing up into a distorted grimace. Tears started into her eyes, slid out of the corners onto her cheeks. "But he told you he loved me and you killed him for it!" She leaned suddenly forward, her hands clawed on the ends of the chair arms. "You killed him!"

Victoria stood up. She heard her own voice speak with slow clarity. "No. He tried to kill me."

There was a slight clatter. Victoria turned toward the sound. Tuck had entered the room through the French doors leading onto the little balcony. He stood there, huge, backed by glass with the night behind it. She was surprised by his appearance, but that was a secondary feeling. In a strange voice Victoria said to him: "It was the coffee, not the sugar. He put the poison in my coffee just after Bernice telephoned. When he was on the telephone I heated the same coffee. I gave it to him."

Tuck was nodding. "Yes. That's how it was." His long head turned slowly and he looked down at Moira. "I am wondering whether to arrest you as accessory before the fact."

Moira shrank against the carving of the high-backed chair. "I didn't have anything to do with it!"

Victoria found that she felt almost sorry for the woman sitting opposite her. "It was all Albert, I think," she told Tuck.

As she spoke, Moira shot to her feet. "I don't believe it! It's only your word! You had as good a chance!" She turned sharply to Tuck, who was still standing on the balcony doorway.

Tuck shook his head. Moira turned slowly and looked at Victoria. Then a brightness blossomed on her face. Her eyes were suddenly stars. Moving limpidly, gently, she eased away from the table. She moved gracefully to the door. She picked up her fur coat. With a sudden swirl, she swung it from her shoulders, like a cape. She drifted to the front door which opened easily to her. She stood with her back to them, facing the night air.

"I'll never get that part. You'll see to that. You'll have it your way. But I had his love." She turned. She was very pretty standing there. There was a sweetness on her face. Her voice was like a silver ice. "How does it feel to know that he tried to kill you for me?" She tipped the upper part of her body forward. One hand pointed to her breast. "For me!" she repeated.

"No," said Victoria. "For himself."

"He hated you," said Moira. Her starry eyes were incongruous with the icy voice.

Victoria walked toward her across the space between them. There was something in that slow and quiet approach which made Moira draw back.

Facing Moira, Victoria said to her: "You don't understand Albert. Albert had only the kindest feelings for women he had used."

A new look showed on Moira Hastings' face, a puzzled understanding. The strange, momentary beauty had left her now.

"When you cry into your pillow tonight, ask yourself how it would have gone if he had come to discover that YOU were the unnecessary one."

Moira's exit was not an exit after all.
