U.S. And Russia Sign Consular Convention

MOSCOW (AP)—The United States and the Soviet Union signed a consular convention—their first bilateral treaty—in a ceremony at Moscow's Spindonovka Palace. Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko called it a positive step toward normal and improved U.S.-Soviet relations.

Gromyko said the signing of the consular convention continues a tendency toward relaxation of international tension that began with the treaty partly banning nuclear tests, which was signed by Britain, the U.S. and the Soviet Union last Aug. 5 in the Kremlin.

The consular convention, which must be approved by the U.S. senate and the Soviet parliament, permits the two governments to establish consulates in the other's country.

The Russians are believed interested in setting up a consulate at Chicago and New York to further understandings was echoed by Gromyko and U.S. Ambassador Foy D. Kohler, the signers.

The difference between domestic legislation and legal and judicial practices including handling of estates left in one country to heirs in the other country, plus the legal status of consular officials in one country, were the varied national practices on consular conventions by accepting Soviet desires for a legal status approaching the immunity of diplomats.

The Soviet Union overrode its own criminal code by agreeing to notify the U.S. within one to three days of the arrest or detention of a U.S. citizen and permit a consular officer to communicate with the citizen within two to four days. The Soviet code allows a person to be held incommunicado during investigation.
