Britain Has No Early Plan For B. Guiana Independence

WASHINGTON (AP) — The British government is reported to have no intention of granting independence to strife-torn British Guiana until the contending Negro and East Indian communities have demonstrated the ability to live together in peace. Prime Minister Wilson stated his government's views in U.S. officials with whom he has conferred here in the last two days. Presumably he made the explanation directly to President Johnson. There has been some U.S. government apprehension that lem of elections in British Guiana but, on coming to power, decided not to interfere with the voting. The question of independence for British Guiana was tied into the timing of the voting and the possibility that some action for independence would shortly follow. In Wilson's view, as it has been made known here, independence can come about only when the British government decides the time has arrived for it. Wilson is understood to have stated this position to Jagan when Jagan was in London.
