Things I Love

To see the first faint flush of dawn,
To feel the sunlight warm upon my face;
To hear wind music in the trees at night,
A symphony of harmony and grace.

To smell mint bushes near a garden gate,
And spicy, fragrant ferns around my feet;
The scent of lilacs after sudden rain,
Earth freshly turned and clover white and sweet.

To hear the raindrops falling softly,
As soothing as a Mother's lullaby;
To see a cloud of palest rose or amber,

To see the fleeting loveliness of poppies,
A moon pale gold against the dark of night;
A bird with slender wings uplifted,
Flash silver in a path of gleaming light.

To see white violets in the sunny hollows,
Of the cool green woodlands that I love;
To see the strange deep shadows come at twilight—
These are the things I love.

Murder In Duplicate
by Glenn Carr

"Mary Lincoln said she ran past him up the drive to the cottage. There were lights on, and she let herself in with her own key. She found her aunt in the living room. Mrs. Dormer was almost unconscious, but she managed to say one word, which sounded like 'will!' The girl phoned for help, but Mrs. Dormer was dead before the ambulance arrived."

Whitcombe's pipe had gone out. He fished in his pocket for matches.

A post-mortem showed that Mrs. Dormer had died of strychnine poisoning. And Mary Lincoln was arrested. Mrs. Dormer was a rich woman. After the quarrel she threatened to change her will, so that Mary would get nothing. She proposed to leave her money to a distant cousin—this chap Corder. But she died before she could. The police thought that was the motive.

"What about the man Mary Lincoln saw?" Jim asked.

"The man she said she saw," Whitcombe corrected dryly. "Papers called him 'the missing witness, because he never turned up. If you ask me, he never existed outside Mary Lincoln's imagination."

Jim said lightly: "What happened to her?"

Whitcombe scowled. "Oh, she got off. Mrs. Dormer may have died accidentally. She'd been taking a medicine with strychnine in it. The girl's counsel made the most of that; a chap called Welles."

Jim jerked upright. "Not Frank Welles?"

"That was the name. He made the most of the fact that the girl admitted that her aunt's last word was about her will; if Mary murdered her to prevent her changing the will, why should she mention a damning fact against herself? Welles argued that it proved her innocence. But his real case was based on previous instances of accidental strychnine poisoning. It seems that if a drug containing strychnine isn't shaken up properly, the strychnine may crystallise and lie at the bottom of the bottle. Just before she died, Mrs. Dormer had taken the last of her drug. In the end, the court accepted Welles's version."

Jim tried to make his voice casual. "What was Mary Lincoln like?"

"She was young and pretty. Twenty-three but said to look about sixteen. Very modest and demure. 'Virginal,' one of the reports called her. Neat black hair. Pretty plump face. Grey eyes."

Whitcombe thumped the top of his desk. "But in my opinion, Mary Lincoln conformed in every particular to a certain type of woman poisoner! And I'll tell you something more: a poisoner who's got away with it once always tries again!"

"Mrs. Dormer died three years ago. Mary Lincoln disappeared immediately after the trial. But one of these days she'll be heard of again. The next time it may be some other foolish old woman. Or perhaps a rival. Or even a lover. No, she won't be able to resist the temptation to use the little white crystals on someone else. I'm looking out for her. That is why I read all the poison cases."

In Jim's office, the telephone rang.

He left Whitcombe with a muttered excuse. His hand trembled as he lifted the instrument.

"Jim!"

The voice made him jump. He had a painfully vivid picture of the wide-spaced grey eyes, the smooth, almost sleek prettiness of the plump face.

"Mary." His defences abruptly crumbled. "Look, there's something I've got —"

"I can't wait." She sounded breathless. "Jim, about our dinner date—I shan't be able to see you tonight." She paused. "Please don't come to the flat."

Before he could reply, she rang off.

He waited a moment, his thoughts in a turmoil. Then, slowly, he dialled a number.

"Frank?" His own voice surprised him by its quietness.

"Frank, I must see you; it's —"

Frank Welles's voice cut in sharply.

"Is it about Mary?" he demanded. "Oh!" He stopped abruptly, as if realizing a mistake.

Jim said slowly: "How did you know it was about Mary?"

Frank was silent for a moment. When he spoke, his normally good-humoured voice was graver than Jim had ever heard it.

"Look here, Jim, whatever you have heard—I repeat, whatever you have heard—don't do anything until you've seen me. Understand?"

"I —"

"That's fine!" Frank spoke briskly. "I can't see you just now, but come round to my place this evening—say at eight-thirty. And Jim —?"

"Yes?"

"Don't try to talk with Mary until I've seen you."
