

Greater Development In Canadian North Is Urged

By FORBES RHUDE
Canadian Press Business Editor
JASPER, Alta. (CP) — Canadians, already pushing north on a wide front, should put even greater effort behind the drive, J. Douglas Gibson, assistant general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, said Tuesday in an address to the Canadian Gas Association.

"Northern development is so important in our national picture," Mr. Gibson said, "that it deserves national attention and at times may justify national outlays just as the development of the West did in our earlier history."

"We cannot assume that lines of communication and transportation into the north will be built as promptly as they are needed," Mr. Gibson gave the northern frontier and the broad push into it as one reason for confidence in Canada's long-range future.

Some evidence of speculation, particularly in real estate," Mr. Gibson said that in the aggregate Canadian business is relatively more active than American with the Canadian economy growing more rapidly and having a relatively bigger capital expansion program.

Nevertheless problems were arising in some industries and export demand had slackened — affecting wheat and lumber especially. There had been some easing in the pressure of demand on metals; prices of traditional base metals had declined and even aluminum was in fairly ample supply.

New housing starts were down considerably and some domestic industries, including those making household appliances, were finding the market less than satisfactory.

This, of course, did not add up to a recession. There remained the tremendous stimulus of the capital expansion program, especially in the number of big projects such as the trans-Canada pipeline and the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Consumer incomes were high and still rising, the level of employment was favorable, and current momentum seemed sufficient to maintain active conditions through this year and perhaps longer.

"But having said this," Mr. Gibson added, "it should also be recognized that the upward trend has been checked and there is a distinct possibility that our business situation will become more mixed."

SCENE MIXED
 Looking at the immediate scene, he found the business picture, while good in general, rather mixed — with some industries operating at record levels and others showing difficulty.

"If we look at the present picture dispassionately," Mr. Gibson said, "we can scarcely fail to find indications that the boom may be getting tired."

"The current period of expansion has, after all, been going on almost continuously for 10 years. In the process, our price structure and our capital values have adjusted themselves to the much increased money supply. Business is less liquid than it was and money has become tighter."
