The Dead Statesman.

Tributes to His Memory.

Some Press Comments.

ALL the leading newspapers of Canada and the United States contain references to the death of Canada's Premier, Sir John A. Macdonald. The universal feeling is that the nation has sustained a great loss; that we shall not soon look upon Sir John's like again. Subjoined are a few of the press comments, condensed from papers on both sides of politics:—

(St. John Sun.)

For more than a week Canadian interest and attention have centered in a death-bed scene at an old house on the bank of the Ottawa. All is over now, and the most active and potent spirit in the Canadian public life of this century, the matchless politician, the premier among colonial prime ministers, is gone. Sir John Macdonald has for nearly half a century been a force in British North America, and for a quarter of a century he has been the greatest individual political force on the northern half of this continent. In all our great national undertakings since confederation he was the chief directing hand, and in many he was the originating brain. His history is the history of Canada during his time. Sir John Macdonald's memory can well afford to await the final verdict of history. He has been too active in political warfare to allow an impartial judgment to be reached by his contemporaries. Not more can the opinion expressed from pulpits draped in black or by his comrades sorrowing for a lost friend and leader, or even by opponents paying their tribute of respect over the grave of a noble foe, be taken for a just and final verdict. In this hour of mourning the fallings and limitations of our dead statesman need not be mentioned, but they are a part of his wonderful individuality. Sir John Macdonald was no angel of light, but a thoroughly human man. He loved power not only for what it enabled him to do for his country, but for its own sake.

He loved his country with no abstract platonic love, but as a father loves his child, or as he loved his old friends and comrades. He was jealous and anxious for Canada's welfare and was willing to wear out his life for the nation's sake. If he did not despise power and fame for himself, his first and last ambition was to make Canada great and famous and prosperous as a portion of the British empire.

(Halifax Herald.)

The death of a country's greatest man is of significant educational value to the nation. The minds of all are turned toward the chief object of their sympathy and affection. The national sorrow levels all distinctions of race, class or creed, wipes out all prejudice and suspicion, and reveals to the whole people that in their great grief they are not divided. Sir John Macdonald had for a quarter of a century taxed all the energies of his being to form and consolidate the Canadian confederacy, yet it was only when his life work was ended, and his magnificent mind had ceased its hitherto unceasing toll, that the people of Canada were enabled to realize how closely they had been knit together by his life and by his death in indissoluble bonds of national sympathy and sentiment. The life of such a man has not been lived in vain. Thousands have become imbued with his self-same spirit of patriotic devotion to Canada. We are now one people from the Atlantic to the Pacific. His death has more clearly revealed to us that profound truth. The country may take on new forms of development. Unexpected political issues may arise. Party lines may be readjusted. Other contests may be fought and won. But ever after this the Canadian people will realize in their national experience, as never before, that spirit of unity and high devotion to public duty, which was the moving force in Sir John Macdonald's eventful public career.

(St. John Telegraph.)

It is only by the lapse of time that we shall know how much the death of Sir John Macdonald may signify to Canada, and it is yet too soon to rightly estimate the place which the fallen chieftain will hold in our national history. But that place must be a large one. Sir John was gifted beyond most men in many ways, and beyond all the men of his time in Canada in the qualities of a great leader. He was fortunate, too, in the time of his appearance on the stage of our national affairs. Having attained a foremost place in the affairs of old Canada he was naturally chosen as the leader in the movement which extended Canada first to the Atlantic and afterwards to the Pacific. In this great work his ambition as well as his abilities played a conspicuous part, and he was well known to be greatly desirous to make the bounds of Canada wider yet, and "round up" its proportions by bringing Newfoundland into the union. It was his fortune to be at the head of affairs when the great project of a trans-continental Canadian railway was begun and completed. And even when out of power it was his influence with the people which gave the chief impetus to the movement—ill advised as we believe, but still a most important one—that changed the entire fiscal and economic policy of the country. Another of the greater events of his life was the successful part he played as a member of the joint high commission which succeeded in negotiating the treaty of Washington in 1871.

(St. John Gazette.)

After a struggle of many days with mortal illness, Sir John A. Macdonald passed quietly away. In Sir John's case the spirit and the body did not part without a long struggle, yet we doubt whether, if he had been so favored as to have the ordering of the manner of his death, he would have had it otherwise than it was. The best years of his youth, manhood, mature age and old age were devoted to his country. His patriotism was Roman in its firmness and in its disinterestedness. All expectation of acquiring wealth was put aside in order that he might devote himself wholly to Canada. Men may say that he loved power, but power was a necessity if his work was to be well done, and its possession was merely an incident of his career. Whatever faults can be charged against Sir John A. Macdonald no man can say that he ever profited to the extent of one dollar by the use of the opportunities at his command. Sir John died comparatively a poor man; he might have died a very rich one if he had been willing to take advantage of the power in his hands. Full of years and full of honors he died the foremost man in the colonial empire of Great Britain with the people of two hemispheres anxiously watching the bulletins from his sick room and political friends and foes mingling their tears that the country should lose the services of one who so long had stood foremost in the councils of Canada.

(Moncton Times.)

The death of Sir John A. Macdonald has been a shock to the entire Dominion, a cause of real regret to hundreds of thousands of our people and a source of profound sorrow to thousands of enthusiastic admirers and personal friends in and beyond the limits of Canada. Sir John's work is all around us, so that none can fail to see it or estimate it at its true worth. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the international boundary line to the Arctic ocean, the task of his life, to which he devoted all the grasp and energy and foresight of his comprehensive intellect—the founding and building up of a strong and rich Northland in the new world—is an evident accomplished fact. This is his monument. The poet writes of "the vast and wandering grave" of ocean. Encircling the small parcel of ground in which the stricken Prime Minister shall rest in peace is the terra firma of the Dominion to which he gave name and unity and solidity. And this Dominion is his legacy. Such as it is, he, more than any man living or dead, has made it; what it is to be depends upon the courage and faith of those to whom he leaves the guidance of its destinies.

(Picton Standard.)

Canada's Grand Old Man and noble Premier has passed away. A statesman has fallen, one whose name was regarded with pride by Canada's loyal sons, and a man of whom it may be truly said he lived for his country's good. We mourn for our great Conservative Leader. Through his wonderful energies and enthusiastic devotion, Canada has become a nation, her people are united, and prosperity marks her onward course to greatness and renown. One pulsation beats from every Canadian's breast, deep regret for the fallen chieftain, and in every town and city, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the flag at half mast proclaims the highest respect for the memory of the man, and the deepest grief at his demise. "He rests from his labors but his works do follow him." They follow him to the grand achievements he accomplished in this fair land, and in the building up of a nationality which is now recognised as the finest jewel in the British Crown.

(St. John Globe.)

Sir John A. Macdonald's career was practically closed when he was first taken ill. At his age death comes as a natural thing. Sir John has outlived all the contemporary men of his early political life, and a great many of those who were associated with him in the formation of the Confederation are not now on the stage of politics. Personally, Sir John was very much liked by the men who were intimate with him. He had warm and hearty friends who often made great sacrifices for him; and whose warm attachment shows that he possessed qualities which were effective in drawing men to him. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that many of his political opponents—men who have been in public life for years—heartily disliked the man because of the methods which he employed. However, the country believed in him and that was sufficient for him.

(Boston News.)

Sir John Macdonald's brave fight for life is over, and the greatest and most conspicuous figure in Canadian politics has passed from the stage of action. Sir John was the head and mainstay of the Conservative party, a shrewd and active politician, and, more than all this, a statesman with broad views. He was essentially a leader and diplomat; possessed a genius for the conducting of government, and was ever ready with some new stratagem when his purposes otherwise seemed doomed to failure. His life-work has been read by all and needs no eulogy at this time. He inspired the Canadian provincial federation, by his foresight aided in building the Canadian Pacific R. R., secularized the clergy reserves, developed the public school system, remodeled the criminal laws and in general advanced the standard of government in the Dominion.
