ELLEN'S DIARY

Morning To Go Fishing

These days as haylands ripen toward the mowing the air is laden with the scent of clover. We catch its fragrance now through the open window, borne in on the night-breeze that stirs gently the curtains.

"Bites... bites! You is a no-good fish-woman, Ellen! Not a one did you 'll' above dat dar watah. Must not tell the chilluns. They'll laugh fit to kill, so dey will. Fish-dar-nice ones—can't catch 'em no-how. Bettah pile yo-self off home an' get yo' dinnaah to cookin'."

"That was the work today—repairing the buildings at another farm of the place. The carpenter with Gage and Mack as his apprentices, both well practiced with hammer and nails, shingled a low roof there; the others, including Jamie, were intent on raising a barn so that fine new silks might be put into place, many hands serving together to lighten the labour."

"We brought you and my mother shingles for your fires" Mack announced coming in at his day's end. "Ans," he smiled, "we brought the new moon. Want to go fishin'?"

"Mind you look at it over the right shoulder," said a voice from the dusk. We found it in a bright glow, "Up above the world so fair" over the sleepy summer fields.

"Until tomorrow — — — Diary Good-night."

MRS. GORDON MacMILLAN A COUNTRY GARDEN

Give me a graden filled with quiet flowers. Sweet lavender, delphinium and rose. So shall new hope be born.

Lavender and roses bloom together in the garden; and if you plan on making lavender sachets it is now the time to cut it when the bloom is at its best.

Here is one that seems easy enough for any of us. Gather all the following flowers and herbs on a fine day—Roses, Thyme, Rosemary, Sweet Marjoram, Lavender, Myrtle, Southernwood, Balm, Sweet Basil, Bay Leaves.

The flaming colours of the annuals are just beginning to show, and they are such a comfort as they weed and weed and am thankful for the wonderful growth of the flowers when the tall weeds are at last pulled from the Zinnias and other annuals new to me.

In addition to the fragrant flowers mentioned and blooming now, are the Madonna Lillies. In the evenings it is possible to find them by following the scented breeze when they are planting in the rock garden here with pale pink roses and delphinium nearby.

The Mock Orange blossoms of the Philadelphia are a planned decoration for weddings and the lovely new hybrids are beautifully fragrant and suitable for baskets.

Many new shrubs have been planted here in the last few years and are now making a good showing. The Deutzia shrubs are also wonderful this time and the more I see of these shrubs the better they seem to be for a busy gardener and that includes most of us I think.

The tuberous begonias have begun to bloom in all their brilliant colors and it is good to see them. Visitors are always impressed with these huge blooms and the gardener feels quite flattered. It is not always easy to do this for such a prolonged season as we have here in the garden, so that the begonias are very welcome to the busy gardener.

The crimson glow has faded from the sky and twilight dies in one last primrose flush. The world sinks into slumber with a sigh, and all around me falls a sudden hush. I walk here in my garden all alone, its lovely colors have vanished with the light.

When twilight comes and nature stills the hum that haunts the dales and hills, dim shadows deep and combine and Heaven with its crystal wine the cups of thirsty roses fills. Blythe birds with music-burdened bills, hush for a space their tender trills and seek their homes in tree and vine when twilight comes. So't melody the silence thrills played by the nymphs along the rills; and where the dew-kist grasses twine, the loads and crickets tattoo find drums to the file of whip-poor-wills.

The other evening a fat toad would not keep off the back step where it was necessary to walk in and out quite often. Care was taken that no harm came to him. There are many things in a country garden to enjoy besides the flowers and sleeping out in garden houses or under the stars can be wonderful! The silence clung about me like a gift, the tender night-time folded me around protectingly. And in a peace profound the clouds dropped slowly backward, drift on drift into the darkness, and the moon was gone.
