

ELLEN'S DIARY

The Garden Yields Bounty Of Vegetables And Fruit

"I should have been up before this, Ellen," James offered, looking up his boots this morning. "I wonder if Mack's been to the garden yet. It was so hot today that Mack is away."

Neither communication nor tidings have been received by the home folks since he went. They are waiting for the arrival of the postman at the mailbox, with more than a casual interest these days.

"We miss Mack," James remarked at dinner.

"At the having," Ellen nodded. "Everywhere, Ellen? He's a great find to see to things - takes a man's place now on the farm. And best of all, he enjoys the farming. And without that, no one can or should try to farm, because he will never find happiness there."

And the sun was July's. And it was a stiff breeze that blew. "A wind of the having - this" we said, watching the leaf-shadows dance on the lawn.

A favorite dinner, we served this farmer. Pork chops together with the gifts of the season from the garden. So abundantly, it gives now to our tables: green onions so tangy, the crisp of lentils, or if one prefers, the fern-green of the leafy variety. Beets from the thinning, steamed and buttered, a sprinkle of vinegar added for piquancy. "A relish today of sprouts. From a spring dandelion," we suggested with a chuckle. "Or a first butter-cup!"

Or from a sunset like that which this evening pleased our farmers, who found no fault with its glorious shades. Or maybe from a star like this night's!

Until tomorrow - Diary - Good-night.
