SHELLA ORDERED OUT

"Look here, Gerry," she said, "it's not turning me out! I want to stay, and see the fun."

Gerald did not move. And that admirably tailored, immovable back irritated her almost beyond endurance.

"Well," he answered, "you can't! I suppose you don't want me to be here to see you make a fool of yourself? That wouldn't be a novelty you know!"

"I'm afraid you can't rile me easily as you used to be able to," was Gerald's only retort. "One gets used to anything!"

"Not if you're any spirit, Gerry. I've not got used to Tan Fu."

But Gerald was firm in his determination not to take up the challenge.

"Wu will be here any time now," he said. "You'd better get off along over to Janet's."

"You do look after my comfort, don't you?" said Sheila. "Dear Janet!"

"She's a jolly good sort," said Gerald indignantly. "And she's been most awfully nice to you."

"She," said Sheila deliberately, "has behaved like a perfect Christian lady—the sort that goes in for rescue work!"

"It's not her fault if she's mid-dle-aged."

"And flat-footed, and fat-headed—and aggravatingly helpful. It is my misfortune!"

Gerald turned back to the window, passing his hand wearily across his forehead.

"She's expecting you, Sheila," was all he said.

"But I want to see Wu!" said Sheila plaintively. "Why should you want to deprive me of the only original experience I'm likely to get out of this frightful spot?"

"Do be sensible Sheila! I'm supposed to be giving Wu an official interview—not tea and games!"

"Then why should the Reverend Patrick be invited?" asked Sheila.

"He asked to come," said Gerald curtly.

"And I ask to stay."

"The padre is responsible for the safety of his mission Chinese," said Gerald irritably. "Considering Wu's threats to the town, it's natural that James should want to know what he has to say."

Sheila shrugged her shoulders. "You must get along," Gerald continued. "Janet will be worrying that you haven't turned up."

Sheila lay back in her chair. "She will," she agreed calmly, "but then Janet loves worrying about other people—it's her life's work!"

"A saucer of milk for Mrs. Have-lock, please," said Gerald, with a laugh quite hideously forced.

"Oh don't try to be funny, Gerry! If I go now, I can't dress before dinner."

"Then dress now!"

"So as to have to walk half a mile in evening shoes! Don't be a perfect idiot!"

Gerald swung round. "This was all fixed days ago," he said. "Must you argue about it now?"

CHAPTER XIII

VANITY VERSUS LOVE

There was no active resentment in Sheila's voice as she replied—merely a weary exasperation, far more trying to Gerald's overwrought nervous system.

One must amuse oneself somehow," she said.

"I'm glad you find this conversation amusing," retorted Gerald sarcastically. "If you want to know, it bores me to death! And I'm worried enough as it is."

"Why?" asked Sheila. "I'm sure the padre will back you up against"

General Wu with all the armoury of the Church militant! By the way, it might be useful to remember what Leslie said about Wu—that spirits were his weak point. I've put the whisky handy in case—"

"I'm not bothering about Wu!" Interrupted her husband. The mere mention of Leslie Dale's name had flicked him like the cut of a whip.

"I'm going to settle with him all right."

"That," said Sheila, picking up a novel, "is a great comfort."

Gerald lost his temper. "You see," he flared, "you don't believe I can. You sneer at everything I try to do! At every effort I make to pull things round! That's what's worrying me to death! It's you!"

Sheila looked at him in amazement. To do her justice it must be admitted that until that moment she had not realized the lengths to which Gerald's feelings of self-pity and humiliations were likely to drive him. A very genuine pity rose up in her as she appreciated the changes in his face: the haggard, hollowed cheeks; the restless burning eyes; hands and lips that were never still.

"Don't work yourself up, Gerry," she said quietly. "You asked for it, you know. If you'd followed my wishes we'd have been back in Shanghai weeks ago."

"Your wishes! You mean that I don't love you any more?"

Sheila shrugged her shoulders and sighed.

"What's gone wrong, Sheila?" He crossed the room, and knelt beside her chair, clutching at her arms as though he sought reality in the movement, so desperate in his faint involuntary shrinking away from him of the girl's whole body.

"Can't you give me another chance? I know I was pretty foul to you the day that Dale went—but I've apologized enough for that sure? We could be happy here, if only we made the effort and pulled together. It wasn't so bad at first. But when you keep away and never say a word to me except to ask for the butter—what do you expect me to feel like? It's been—"
