THE TIRED MAN

Chapter 46

Several things happened before Pandora had lived in the city long.

She found herself possessed of what was to her a wardrobe of undreamt of luxury. She found herself the mistress of Gloria's household. She was in charge of Francis and the new cook, a huge negro who could get up the most delicious meals, whose intentions of keeping the place clean were always good, but whose inborn laziness was too much for the best of intentions.

"She sees a room as a perfectly round place," Pandora said once with humorous exasperation. "There are no corners in her world. And she takes a nap every day after luncheon."

This brought a laugh from Gloria. "Never mind, her muffs are as round as the moon and her roasts are something to die for," she said. "We take what we can get these days and give thanks. Pan, do you know my young friend, George has taken a great fancy to you?"

"Has he?" Pan asked in surprise. "Has he?" mimicked Gloria. "Is that so strange?"

"Yes," Pan answered. "For if he does, he's the third person who has."

And at Gloria's incredulous smile she went on:

"My father, who is as fickle as I and you, who are so very kind and sympathetic."

She did not mention Morton, who was always in her mind, the memory of whom still hurt sorely.

But she treasured this new link. And when George Ridgeway came in one afternoon a few days later, her eyes lit up with the greatest joy at seeing him.

"But Gloria isn't here, she's not coming home until late," she said. "She's going from her office to dinner and then to the theatre."

"Then you'll ask me to have tea with you won't you?" George said and settled himself down into his favorite cushioned chair.

"That's how our friendship began. How long are you staying?" he asked once.

"As long as Gloria wants me," Pan answered. "But I'm not much use now. Frankie is better and she has a cook. I suppose I'll go back to the farm in the Spring."

The queer depressed feeling came over her again at the idea. The farm—and Gladys—and the baby who would be born in the late summer; and Morton driving out each day from his office. Grandma White's scolding and her father's restlessness to get away— began closing down on her like prison walls!

"You like Gloria, don't you?" she heard George ask. And at once the prison walls vanished.

"Oh, I adore her," she cried her hands unconsciously clasping together as he said it. "You— you can't imagine what she's been to me. She's the most wonderful woman I ever knew."

"A large compliment," George laughed. "But she's just—the girl paused for an adequate word, then added, "perfect."

A little cynical expression appeared again, making the man look older and tired again.

"What a thing it is to be young enough and inexperienced enough to believe still in perfection!" he said. "I don't know whether I envy you the youth that point of view implies, or feel sorry for you because of the bitterness and disillusionment still ahead of you."

"I've had the bitterness and disillusionment," Pan said, suddenly able to talk freely to this man. "You!"

"Yes."

H. S. STEWART,
Hon. Sec'y Treas.

P. S.—This fund will continue open till last of May, those intending to contribute to this worthy object will kindly do so at once.

Then just as suddenly, her old shyness came back and her self confidence she had gained fled away from her.

"A man or woman?" George asked.

"Oh, a man." She had to answer. "I never met a woman I could like as all, until I met Gloria. She's been everything wonderful, she couldn't be disillusioning."

George smiled again. "You still have faith. That proves how young you are. It's only been half a disillusionment."

Pan glanced at him shyly. He was lounging back in the big chair, his legs straight out in front of him, feet crossed. One hand was thrust in his pocket, one had the inevitable cigarette that he so rarely puffed at, loosely held between his fingers of his finely modelled hand.

He was staring into the fire, not looking at Pan at all.

The girl thought suddenly how tired he was! His eyes had lines at the corners, there were lines at each side of his mouth. She wanted at once to feed him eggs and cream and make him take afternoon naps and long, country walks. She lost forever her shyness of him when she gained a pity for him.

What had been his disillusionment and disappointment? Gloria? Gloria was married she knew.

"You are in love with Gloria," she thought out loud.

MISS BETSY STEWART

The death took place at the old Stewart homestead in Brudenell, on Sunday, April 16th, inst., of Betsy Stewart, an old and respected resident of that locality in the eighty seventh year of her age.

A woman of robust constitution she enjoyed to the full, throughout her long life the greatest of all blessings, good health. Pneumonia that most dreaded disease severed the ties that bound her to earth, her death removing from the world's broad field of battle the oldest resident of Brudenell. A Presbyterian in religion she was an ardent supporter of that organization. One brother, Angus, is left to cherish his memory. The funeral services were conducted by the Rev. J. D. McKenzie's assisted at the grave by the Rev. Mr. Greenleaves, interment being in the family plot in Georgetown there to abide till the trumpet of the Lord shall sound and time shall be no more.
