Extreme measures were distinctly eschewed and prohibition was not advocated in the main. The points emphasized were local option, the prevention of sale of liquor to persons under eighteen years of age, Sunday closing and the extension of the licensing law to clubs. On these points it was considered that every shade of religious opinion could unite.

While this meeting was in progress in London there was a meeting at Manchester to protest against the high cost of beer.

The meeting was called by the district licensed trade, but the promoters decided that it was constantly asked for an opportunity to protest against the heavy taxation on liquor.
