Confident that our communication will receive your most careful attention, we respectfully solicit an immediate reply.

The most reliable establishments use the best stationery—which is a point for all business men to consider. A change in the style of your stationery, if an improvement, will give you an advantage. Quality of material and tastefulness of design are the features which make attractive stationery."—The Advertising World.

THE REAL PRESENCE.

Catholic Belief Explained by Father Elliott.

The following is a summary of Father Elliott's sermon last evening on the subject, "The Presence of Christ in the Eucharist":

The Catholic Church teaches, and always has taught, that in the holy communion that which was originally bread and wine is, by the consecration, changed into the substance of the body and blood of our Lord, together with His soul and divinity which change is properly called transubstantiation. To Catholics this is the most consoling, the most cheering and every way most blessed portion of our creed.

Let us open the gospel of St. John at the sixth chapter. "I am the living bread which came down from Heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live forever; and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. The Jews, therefore, strove among themselves, saying: How can this man give us His flesh to eat? Then Jesus said unto them, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me and I in him. As the living Father hath sent me and as I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me."

Now, the question between Catholics and others is whether our Saviour meant these words to be taken literally or figuratively. At any rate, this much is certain: The Jews took the literal meaning. They said, in effect, "The thing is impossible." They must be considered as agreeing with Catholics in understanding our Saviour's words in the literal sense. And, therefore, so far as hearers are the proper witnesses of the meaning of the words addressed to them, the testimony of the Jews is in favor of the literal meaning. The same may be said of our Saviour's own disciples; they also thought, and were by Him left to think, that he meant to be understood literally.

Our Lord is a model of simplicity and frankness. He has to teach a doctrine and he does so plainly and directly. The doctrine is disbelieved as absurd; objections are raised. He goes on repeating it in the very terms which gave offense and he insists on their accepting it without reserve.

It is sought to parry the force of this reasoning by the sixty-fourth verse, "The flesh profiteth nothing; the words which I have spoken to you are spirit and life." Here he declares his meaning to be spiritual, but does that mean figurative? When in Scripture the flesh and spirit are declared to be opposed to each other, it means the carnal man and the regenerate man, the carnal spirit and that of the divine grace. And in this Catholic view of the meaning of the verse many distinguished Protestants agree.

But the passages which treat of the actual institution of this heavenly rite are far more important. Let us now direct our attention to them. Open St. Matthew's gospel at the twenty-sixth chapter and the twenty-sixth verse: "And while they were at supper Jesus took bread and blessed, and brake, and gave to His disciples, and said: 'Take ye and eat: this is my body.' And taking the chalice He gave thanks, and gave to them, saying: 'Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the new testament, which shall be shed for many for the remission of sins.'" You are aware that the same circumstances are related very nearly the same words used by two other evangelists, and also by St. Paul in his first epistle to the Corinthians. The words to be considered are common to them all.

It must be owned that it is not easy to make an argument based on these words. For what is there to argue about? Could anything add strength or clearness to these expressions?—"This is my body—this is my blood?" Catholics simply believe that it was Christ's body, it was Christ's blood. It would seem enough to simply recite the passage, and rest the case. Suppose there were no question of apparent impossibility, suppose the words related to some other matter any one who accepted Christ as his teacher would simply say: "He has declared this doctrine in the simplest terms, and I receive it on His word."

In answer to this plain reasoning it is said that the words "This is my body" may be rendered "This represents my body," because in certain other passages some form of the verb to be undeniably does mean represent as where our Saviour says: "I am the door." "I am the vine." True, in these passages the verb to be does mean to represent. But there are some thousands of other passages in Scripture where the verb to be does not mean to represent: why not interpret text in question by the analogy of these very many passages rather than of the very few others? Let us have some good reason for drawing an inference from a small number of analogies rather than from a vast multitude. By such a process as this one can place any meaning on any given passage. It will become us, who seek a plain way to a plain truth in the plain word of God, to cumber ourselves with rules of interpretation calculated to confuse the meaning of Scripture rather than to unveil it. Let us not be turned aside from the strict and literal meaning of God's word by the Jews' objection, "How can this thing be done?"

At the conclusion of his lecture Father Elliott answered a number of questions that had been asked through the question box.

There was a large congregation notwithstanding the very unfavorable weather. Tonight the closing lecture will be given on prayer for the dead and the intercession of the saints.

Admiral Sampson has been warmly eulogizing the newspaper men who were with the United States forces in the late war with Spain. Here is a reference to the son of Mr J E B McCready, editor of the Guardian: "There was Ernest McCready, the son of one of Canada's most famous literary men, who was sent by the New York Herald to represent that newspaper at the front. To those who witnessed the cool bravery of 'Mac,' as he is familiarly known to his associates, taking notes of the most minute incidents of the numerous fights in Cuba, it was difficult to believe him to be the man of the mild and child-like manner who was known as one of the best descriptive writers on James Gordon Bennett's newspaper. He seemed to jump in a moment from a novice at the game of dodging bullets and shrapnel to a veteran for whom war missiles had no terrors at all. Under fire his coolness and disregard of personal danger made him an object of admiration to the men who had made a life business of fighting."
