

the influence of the High Priest of Truth, (Duncan Maclean aforesaid) and to corrupt and darken the pure spirits of the sons and daughters of Eve, dwelling in that delightful locality? Or who knows but that Duncan Maclean is destined to rival the fame of St. Patrick, who exterminated the venomous snakes and reptiles that infested the lovely fields and valleys of Erin, the only difference between the worthy old saint and Duncan being, that the latter shall make his incantations, not in canonical robes, and with crosier and mitre, but with printer's ink and leaden types? We suggest that a copy of the Islander containing the article referred to, be at once deposited in the place where the great snake was seen, with a half-length portrait of Duncan affixed thereto, and we will be willing to bet a nine-penny with any one, that he will never be seen there again.

We reject in toto the supposition of a correspondent, who has addressed us a long letter on this subject, wherein he says, that possibly Duncan Maclean might have been taking a lounge in the field where the supposed snake was seen, and that, from the uncommon length and ugliness of the animal, the ardent imaginations of the boys were excited, and were frightened into the belief that they had seen a "great Sarpint," and that Duncan—in order to make an editorial for the Islander—and to keep up his respectability with the yahoos, which might be damaged if it were known that he had placed himself in so undignified a position—therefore published the story of the great Snake. We say we reject this supposition, because, from our knowledge of Duncan's habits, we know he never lies down, except in a bed or under a table.
