MARY HAWORTH

Kicking Husband Out Easier Said Than Done

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: To "kick the husband out" is a psychiatrist's advice to a long suffering wife, as quoted in your column is easier said than done. I have been married for eight years to a selfish narrow minded man who complains about everything but never does anything about any problems. Many times I have wanted to leave him. But we have two preschool age children, and a woman in her leaves home takes custody of her children. Also I have to stay home to look after them. Hence, I could not provide for them and myself. He refuses to give me a divorce. C. G.

Dear C.G.: The specialist's advice, cited above to "kick him out" was given to a housewife whose husband was candidly involved in a present in love affair, unwilling to renounce either woman (wife or paramour) for the other. Thus the nature of that wife's grievance and grounds for divorce (if she so desires) differs from your brand of travail, it appears. She might kick the door against her spouse and be justified. The nub of her problem seems to be that she is unwilling to part from him, despite her
