Strange But True

about?"
"Well, you see mister, I was pretending that Fido was sick so I gave him medicine from a bottle which mother kept on a high shelf in the kitchen."
"What kind of medicine?" asked John. "And just how much of it did you give the dog?"
"The whole bottle," I said. "He loved it too."

John took the reins from my hands and skillfully turned the very high wagon completely around on the very narrow road. When I threw a questioning look at him, he said, "I think we'd better take another look at Fido."

The dog lay back of the cattle shed stiff as a poker. John got down on his knees beside Fido and put his ear to the dog's heart and listened. "Huh!" he snorted. "There's still life in the critter. That medicine only knocked Fido out. Some medicines do that, you know."

"Gee," I cried. "Oh, Mr. Kel-low, I hope Fido don't die. I just know that you can save his life." I was half way through my childish prayer when dear old Fido opened his eyes, gave a great yawn, and slowly rose on his feet.

"Guess I'll go home now," said John rising to his feet and starting towards his horse and vehicle. "Bye son, bye Fido. See you soon."

Soon after this I launched into a venture which earned me sufficient money to buy stacks of penny bars, chewing gum and what not. My muskrat line extended from the mouth of the brook right down to the mill dam. Every morning from November through April I visited my box traps before my brothers were out of bed. From three to half a dozen rats were my reward, and the skins fetched me from 80 cents to $1.35 each.

I was doing pretty well until along came the Indians. Not only did they steal my traps and furs, but they completely exterminated the rats on our creek by digging into their winter homes and killing off the parents. Loss of cash income gave me a brand-new idea. I was always getting brand-new ideas back in those days. I still get a few today. The new idea was to raise muskrats in captivity. I trapped half a dozen females and three males by setting my traps in a distant stream. (If I had been brought up in the city the chances are I wouldn't have known which were females and which males). Thus began the new venture.
