ELLEN'S DIARY

Fall of New Snow Changes Drab Appearance Of Island

So pretty a morning this one was when we came to it. The furrowed fields and the meadows, bare and drab of late because of a strange whim of winter, were now lightly covered with snowfall. It was, we fancied, soft as the dandelion-down, which goes to line the nests of the gold-finch in summer, and as light as the dreams which were ours when it had been drifting down in the night.

"I believe, Ellen, the weather has changed," James said stirring to wakefulness in the wide old bed. He glanced to a window. "Yes, the frosty spell is over. It's considerably milder, I'd say."

Mild today was, with sun at times and then the quiet shadows of clouds. Minutes ago when attended by the Scampiedog we walked up from lane's end, it was beneath a sky set with a million stars. Dim and silent our world of valley spread then, and so peacefully we felt we were quite content with this earth as we know it, having no desire to move away to some other far planet.

Would the moon, for example, be a pictured place as was this, with the velvety dark of the woodlands set beautifully against the white of the fields? Would a dog's bark from some farm up the valley ring across the February night, accenting the perfect silence obtaining? Could the seasons break winsomely in that supposedly barren country like those we have here? Spring in its gold-green shades, summer deepening those and gifting us with numberless flowerings? Autumn painting vale and hill in a riot of colors?

This evening the members of the local W. I. forgathered in the school down the River Road for their meeting. To the passer-by the building looks much as it did long ago. The interior however has kept up pretty well with modern requirements for such classrooms. Not the least of its improvements is the fine heating system which contributes so well to the comfort of the pupils and teacher.

Gone is the sizable wood-stove of James' schooldays, which thawed and heated indifferently; gone too the taller replacement we knew, which used up the scuttles of coal, and belched smoke and gas at a fancy; gone too is the drab paint from walls and ceiling, given place to brighter and more cheerful hues.

Lights are a boon to any night-gathering, and the outlet which makes a kettle sing in no time, adds considerably to the success of the social side of any meet.

"Woof, woof!" Scampie barked sternly as we neared the yard, meaning "Who goes there?"

"Howdy!" the black cat chuckled in a hail and au revoir call from the path of shortcut which leads down to the dam and mill.

"Well, here we are, Missis!" Scampie grinned setting us down at our door. "Just think-away and home again all in one night! Only what was this Monday? Only a happy sigh... a light breath of wind in the trees."

Until tomorrow -- Diary -- Good-night.

The full length sleeves tapered to points over her hands. Her chapel length veil of tulle illusion was held in place by a shell shaped cap of nylon and lace studded with pearls and sequins. hat of yellow. She carried a yellow nosegay with white streamers. George Myers, cousin of the groom was groomsmen. Mrs. Walker, mother of the bride was attired in a blue suit with white accessories and corsage of white carnation.

MARY HAWORTH

Wife Finds Difficulty Trusting Erring Husband

Dear Mary Haworth: Having read your column with great interest for 15 years, I am hoping that you can help me. Bob and I have been married — happily, I thought — for 20 years. Recently, however, it has come to light that he stepped out of line a year or so ago with someone I counted a very close friend. Let's call her Jane.

When I finally realized how naive I had been and asked him about it, he readily admitted the attraction but said it hadn't amounted to anything. This I believe; but still I can't quite dismiss it from my mind.

I recall several occasions when he had reason to stop by her house, which I thought nothing about at the time. Now of course I realize why he went and he doesn't deny it.

He has been wonderfully understanding about my apprehension and more than willing to let me talk about it. However, I still can't get hold of myself. This concerns me for I am sure he really loves me; but how can I regain my former trust?

Jane has no idea that I know of this, and for Bob's sake I mustn't let her know, as it would betray his confidence and honesty. However I find it very difficult to be nice to her or even to be around her. Thank you for any suggestions. J.G.

Dear J.G.: The truth is, you can't recover from your former trust in Bob. It was a blind trust, based on the illusion that he possessed all the plus-qualities of character that you supposed he had.

Now the fact has been forced to your attention (and he admits) that he is capable of cheating, hypocrisy and double-dealing, in his several roles of husband, neighbor and so-called friend. Which means that, realistically you have to re-evaluate your image of him.

You aren't married to a rock-of-ages. You are married to a run-of-the-mill man, with a variable character, who wavered between the high road of responsibility and the low road of sex intrigue when the latter beckoned.

So what are you going to do about this discovery? I feel that the constructive response, the growing attitude, on your part, must consist in finding the philosophical strength to accept him as is. This will give you victory over fear, as you rise to this higher level of awareness in loving and being loved.

For help in getting this encompassing view of life, read C.S. Lewis' book of essays "Christian Behavior" (MacMillan); or Hannah Whitall Smith's classic "The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life" (Revell). M

Dear Mary Haworth: Can you tell me whether or not there are respectable ways for a divorced woman to meet respectable eligible men? I find the predatory types mentioned in your recent column. They are all too common and I'm fed up with them; they consider loavesome women fair game. I will gladly appreciate your guidance. L.F.

Dear L.F.: The divorcee, like anyone else, meets new friends, including occasional eligible men, through the friends she has already. If she has no friends, she has to begin by making some.

Friends are made through contacts; and contacts are made usually through joining group activities. Church, Sunday School, YWCA classes, volunteer work for good causes—Salvation Army, Red Cross, your political party, etc. — all are respectable roads to companionship. M.H.

Mary Haworth counsels through her column, not by mail or personal interview. Write her in care of this newspaper.
