CHAPTER XIII
CLEVER FACE EXPLAINS

Marcia felt a wave of sympathy for this stranger, who was so pathetically anxious to please her. She had been irritated by young Tobin's flippant remarks about the man's unusual homeliness. They aroused in her an interest in Henry Smith which she would not have felt in the case of a man ordinarily, or even unusually handsome. And now he had succeeded in creating in her some curiosity, as well.

Her smile was therefore unusually gracious, as she said: "I am glad that somebody had more confidence in Mainsall than his own had. I did not have even a hundred francs on the horse."

Smith dismissed the question of money with a gesture that was eloquent and convincing. It said that he was interested in winning, but careless about the spoils of victory. And it was a gesture so foreign that Marcia became more interested in him than before.

"You are English, like myself, are you not, Mr. Smith?" she asked.

"An Englishman, who knows next to nothing of his own country," he said. "The great event of my life, if you understand me, Miss Soanes, is that I am about to make acquaintance with England. I have looked forward to it for years; it means everything to me."

"You must meet my aunt," Marcia laughed. "She is never happy away from England. I left her in the stand, planning how she could escape from Paris."

"I should consider it a great privilege to be presented to that lady," Smith said gravely and earnestly.

"Come along then," Marcia said readily.

She had noted Jeanne Lederer waiting not far away, and staring at her with a mixture of dislike and insolence in her regard. It seemed to Marcia an outrageous thing that a woman should attach to herself a man like Henry Smith, simply for the purpose of notoriety and reputation for doing unusual and original things.

She was gratified to notice that Smith accepted her invitation without so much as a glance in Jeanne's direction. He had deserted with a flattering alacrity.

"What do you intend to do in England?" she asked.

"I thought I would go in for hunting," Smith said eagerly. "I am fond of horses and riding; I mean to buy some hunters and begin right away."

Marcia glanced at him suspiciously, but saw, by his face that he was in deadly earnest.

"There is no hunting in the summer, then?"

"I did not know; I know nothing of England," he said. "What does one do in the summer, then?"

"Golf and tennis; and cricket for the men," Marcia said. "People who can afford it go racing a good deal. And there is the seaside, you know; yachting and swimming."

"Then I shall do all these things, except, perhaps, the cricket," Henry Smith decided. "That takes too long, I think."

"Tennis and golf cannot be picked up in a day or two," Marcia warned. "Some people never seem to get the knack of such things."

"I know," he said. "But I am one of the lucky ones. I think. The sports you mention—tennis, golf, and swimming—came easily to me when I was younger. And recently I have attempted something which is said to be more difficult, and surprised my instructors."

"What is that?" Marcia asked, a little resentful of his self-satisfaction.

"Fencing," he replied. "Fencing, you—I mean, we say in English. For my own part, I think that is better worth while than any mere pastime."

"I've always been keen on fencing," Marcia confessed. "But I never seem to make much headway, somehow."

"But best of all," Smith continued, "I like to dance. That seems to be the most civilized way of exercising the body, and the most sociable. I love music, too; and music is part of dancing. In the last few days I have danced a great deal."

"Here is my aunt," Marcia said. "You must know Mr. Smith, aunt. He is an Englishman who knows nothing of England, and yet is enthusiastic about the country. Perhaps I should have said that he is enthusiastic because he knows nothing about England."

"Not at all," Miss Deborah said sharply. "You will find England more pleasant than you could possibly imagine it, Mr. Smith, if you have been accustomed to the discomforts of a city like this."
