CHAPTER XXI

STRANG GETS THE UPPER HAND

The blow had not been entirely unexpected, for Strang had read a last-second warning in his eyes, but it arrived with a speed that gave him no time to avoid or counter it, and the next instant he had stumbled backwards over his overturned chair, and fell sprawling on to the floor. It was no knock-out punch, however, for the fact that he had been drawing back at the moment of impact saved him from the full force of it, and a moment later he was scrambling to his feet again, and reaching for the gun in his jacket pocket.

The significance of the movement was not lost upon Thurlow, and before the trader's fingers had time to close on the weapon, he was on him like a wild-cat.

His first two blows caught Strang at a disadvantage, with his right hand still in his pocket, and had they been well placed they would have ended the fight summarily. As it was, they landed clumsily—a right well above the solar plexus, and a left to the head, which merely glanced off the cheekbone—and then Strang had snatched his hand free and was hitting back furiously.

He was then being borne backwards by the impetus of Thurlow's rush, but for the next few seconds they were too close, together for either of them to be able to do much damage. They reeled across the room, belabouring one another's bodies with half-arm jabs which lacked any real power, and it was not till Strang was brought up with a crash against the wall that the fight entered upon its next phase.

It was the trader who suddenly took the initiative then. Taking advantage of the fact that their bodies were jammed hard together at the moment his backward progress was stopped by the wall, he flung his arms round his opponent's body and left arm, and at the same time lowered his head and butted upwards at his face.

The manoeuvre was completely successful. Thurlow's head snapped back as the other's skull smashed into the point of his chin, and, caught momentarily off his balance, he sagged back helplessly in the trader's grip.

Strang was not slow to take advantage of the situation. With a quick movement, he thrust one leg forward and with a powerful heave hoisted Thurlow's body clear of the ground in a pivoting swing over his out-thrust hip. The latter struck at him viciously with one free arm as he felt himself being lifted clear off the ground, but the next second Strang's hold was released and he was whirling through the air to crash to the floor a good eight feet away.

He was lucky in his landing, for he struck one of the thick native rugs which did something to soften the jar of the fall; but before he could attempt to struggle to his feet again, Strang had leapt at him.

"I'll show you, you swine!" he gasped breathlessly, smashing down blows at Thurlow's defenceless head. In his fury he had forgotten all about the gun in his pocket, and his sole idea at the moment was to hammer his opponent to a jelly with his bare hands.

Thurlow still had all his wits about him, however, for the fall had done little more than shake him, and after the first few moments, when he instinctively tried to dodge the blows raining down upon him, he made a desperate effort to free himself. Strang had one knee on his chest, and with a sudden convulsive twist he turned over half sideways and dislodged the trader's weight. At the same time he hooked a blow upwards at his stomach, and as Strang slipped sideways, rolled over on to hands and knees and scrambled to his feet before he could recover his balance.

From this position he held a momentary advantage, and he made full use of it.

As Strang swung up in his turn, he leapt straight at him, and securing a hold round his waist, swung him straight off his feet and sent him crashing into the gramophone. The instrument pitched over sideways and splintered into ruins under his weight.

Then, before the man could rise, he jumped at him, intending to finish him while he had the chance.
