CHAPTER XXXVI

Back in New York. Back to the old routine. But Alison did not see Terry. He was busy, she heard, working with the engineers on the new "Speed King" which was to cut time between New York and Chicago to three hours.

Then, late in September, she was notified that she was to be stewardess on the new ship when it made its first trial run that week—with-out passengers.

Alison's hand shook as she held the paper which told her that. But she tried to go on talking casually to the operations manager.

"The run will probably be Thursday," he was saying.

"I'll see Terry," in forty-eight hours I'll see Terry!" All night long she tossed, afraid he might ask for another stewardess. They'd grant him that if he asked. But he did not ask for a change.

Steve picked Alison up on his way to the airport, just like old times. And she was so glad to see him she almost cried.

The Trial Run

When they got to the flying field they could see the "Speed King" on the line and Terry with a crew of mechanics was fussing about with it. Mr. Roerden was there for the takeoff, although the trial run was being made without any publicity.

Shortly, without even being able to speak to Terry, they were off. That flight was like a dream, straight, sure! The new ship flew with buoyancy, eagerness. Alone in the cabin, Alison had ample time for her troubled thoughts. They were flying high and straight. At Detroit they were ten minutes ahead of schedule.

The weather was getting bad now, but they forged ahead at terrific speed. Shortly Alison could see the familiar mass of railroad tracks, which meant they were getting into Chicago. Then the arrow on the tank which read "One mile to Chicago Municipal Airport."

Airport still ten minutes ahead of the three hours. Terry had been do more than nod at the little stewardess. Here in Chicago she and Steve waited for him, but he was busy checking with the gas man. So they went on in the restaurant for lunch without him.

Ten minutes later Terry joined them. He looked tired. He dropped into a chair opposite Alison. "Well, we did it!" he said. "Bring me a pint of milk and a ham sandwich." Just as though he had seen Alison only yesterday!

The girl did not raise her eyes from her coffee cup. She could not. They were full of tears.

"The weather's lousy!" he said disconsolately. "Only thing we can do is to get off as soon as possible and try to beat the storm out. Lord! Why did I ever start to fly?" Terry's face was grim.

But both Alison and Steve understood him. He was bitterly disappointed. It might mean they'd not get through to New York again that day.

"We'd better get going, kids. Shake a leg!" And he swallowed the last of the milk and was gone.

They got off from Chicago thirty minutes later, with a ceiling of 800 feet. Terry climbed straight up into the "soup." They were flying blind almost from the first. The weather had become rough and bumpy. Alison, sitting there, looking out at the sealed windows, tried not to think about anything at all.

Lost in the Storm

They must have been out an hour

when Steve opened the door of the cockpit. His face looked drawn, but his voice was calm as he said: "Fasten your safety belt. We've lost the beam."

That was all. Alison had a glimpse of Terry's head, earphones glued to his ears. Steve shut the door. Silence except for the roar of the engines.
