U.S.-Canada Trade Split Seen In Report To Senate

By HAROLD MORRISON

WASHINGTON (CP) — Senator George Aiken has presented the Senate his report on the 1964 Canada - U.S. interparliamentary conference, portraying the depth of the split between the two countries on the question of trade with Communist countries.

The Vermont Republican told the Senate while the neighboring legislators, who met here last January, reached a more unified view on North American defence, they differed sharply on how to deal with the Soviet Union, Communist China and Cuba.

"Specifically, the Canadian delegation did not share the view of the U.S. delegation that a firm embargo should be maintained on trade with Cuba and Communist China," Aiken said in his report circulated among his colleagues during the last few days.

The U.S. group, headed by Aiken and Congressman Cornelius Gallagher, New Jersey Democrat, had appealed for curtailment of credit to Communist countries.

Put the Canadians, headed by Commons Speaker Alan Macnaughton and Senate Speaker Maurice Bourget, countered that with certain exceptions, there should be no discrimination in trade.

CONCERN EXPRESSED

The Americans expressed concern some Canadian wheat sold to Russia was being diverted to Cuba. The Canadians responded by suggesting there is inconsistency between the U.S. sale of wheat to Russia and the strict U.S. embargo on trade with Cuba and the Chinese mainland.

Americans argued that for historical reasons, Cuba was an area of special U.S. interest and concern.

The Canadians were urged to promote Canada's entry into the 21 - country organization of American states, but Aiken said in his report the Canadian delegation, consisting of members of the commons and Senate, divided on the issue.

Some Canadian delegates argued Canada has no history of close association with Latin American while others maintained too much weight is being given to negative arguments and the time has come for Canada to give OAS membership most serious consideration.

The seventh interparliamentary conference discussed world trade, Panama, PAS, the North Atlantic Alliance and Canada's decision to extend her territorial waters to 12 miles from the existing three miles.

ARGUMENT GIVEN

On the latter point, the U.S. delegation argued Canada should not attempt to change the situation by unilateral action but should proceed through international negotiations and agreements.

The Canadian government has stated it will discuss the Canadian proposal with other countries but protect historical and treaty fishing rights in Canada but noted attempts to extend the territorial waters to 12 miles through international agreement failed in the past.

The report said a Canadian legislator questioned U.S. policy towards Panama in the light of U.S. opposition to Britain's 1956 attempt to retain control over the Suez Canal. The Americans argued that continued U.S. control over the Panama Canal is essential for Western hemispheric security.

"The Panama Canal, unlike the Suez Canal, is not a sea-level canal and requires the presence of highly-skilled and efficient personnel for its successful operation," Aiken said in his report.

INVESTMENT ESTIMATE

He estimated gross U.S. investment in the Panama Canal at $1,700,000,000 of which $1,100,000,000 had been recovered, leaving a net of $600,000, still outstanding. Last year's U.S. net revenue from the canal was estimated at $2,300,000.

The two groups reached a closer, warmer understanding on North American defence, an issue that reached a critical point during the 1963 cross-border nuclear controversy. But the conferees suggested this was in the past; that harmony now had been restored and that Canada-U.S. defence sharing in production contracts was a model for other countries to follow.

The conferees suggested, said Aiken, that the success of the North Atlantic Alliance also could accommodate some minor adjustments of forces but that Canada and the U.S. must and would continue to meet their agreed commitments to NATO and North American defence, while looking to other allies to carry out an appropriate portion of the defence burden as their resources increased."
