BLOWITZ'S SCHOOL OF JOURNALISM.

Here is a Hopeful Scheme For Journalistic Aspirants

M. de Blowitz, the Paris correspondent of The London Times, lays before the readers of The Contemporary Review a faucial proposal for the establishment of a School of Journalism. Here are some of his suggestions:

The young aspirant to journalism should have finished his eighteenth year, and should possess the first regular degree according to the collegiate education of his country. He should be seriously grounded in the elements of two languages other than his own. He should serve five years, so that his career should not begin before he is twenty-three, or even later. A younger man cannot be expected to possess the maturity necessary to judge the cause and effects of events with security. He would then be placed in the hands of professors who for two years would teach him the history and literature of each of the great historic and literary divisions of Europe, running over remote periods very rapidly, and becoming more careful and detailed as one drew nearer to the present moment. He would be initiated into the origin and development of spirit of his most remarkable contemporaries in every country. He would be given a general idea of the political constitutions, the ethnologic and climatic conditions, the products, the geographical situation, the means of communication, the armed forces, the budgets and the public debts of each nation. He would be taught to draw both landscapes and the human face. He would learn to box, to ride on horseback, and to use a revolver; but the science of arms, so-called, would be rigorously interdicted, because a man obliged to support his arguments by weapons or who indulges in personalities which place, so to speak, arms in the hands of his foes, is neither a journalist nor worthy to be one. Finally, such a pupil would undergo a graduating examination, and if he failed in any way to satisfy his instructors, he would remain another year, after which, for three years more, he would spend in succession some months at school or college in other lands, so that the remaining three years should be used up by his presence at foreign schools of journalism, and travel in countries where these schools are established, as well as in countries where they might not yet exist. All the schools of journalism should form a federation. Every student should hold an opinion should be dictated from them. The instruction should be elective, without any possibility of pressure from without; and the free judgment of the pupil, formed by experience and conviction, should be respected. The pupil of one school, by this scheme, would be received in any one of the other schools without any extra expense, the cost of the entire course having been fixed in advance. Both resident and traveling scholarships would, of course, be established, as well as retreats for old age, or those temporarily ill from diseases contracted in the fulfillment of their duty. Each school, moreover, would obtain from the serious leading journals in its neighborhood the promise to employ, according to the special needs of the journal, a certain number of pupils, who are thus provided with their final diplomas.

Maritime Welfare. Referring to the huge warships of today, with their enormous guns, The New York Mail and Express says: "It is possible that the development of the light pneumatic guns, or the construction of torpedo boats and the invention of new explosives of high power which can be projected by contrivances of weight than the heavy guns of modern manufacture, may lead to an entire change in the construction of a navy. It is remarkable how easily a great warship can be rendered useless by a simple obstruction. To-day, for instance, advice from France reports that the Monterey, one of the most powerful of our coast-defense vessels, was recently disabled in the bay of San Francisco by running into a fish-net, which tangled her propeller and tied it up. If such a simple device as a fish-net can render a great ironclad invading fleet helpless and leave it to drift at the mercy of the enemy's guns on land, what may not be the possible consequences of offensive and defensive naval warfare?"

Another Theory Knocked Out. Science has disproved the rural belief that thunder sours milk. It is now known that the souring results from a fungus growth, and that this fungus is peculiarly fatal to nursing children. The old-time rural belief was that the concussion from thunder acted mechanically upon the milk, and first soured and then solidified it. The theory is a plausible one, easily derived from observing one set of facts without knowing about the existence of others most important to the situation. It happens that milk does sour during or just after thunder storms, because the atmospheric conditions then prevailing are usually of a kind favorable to the rapid development of the fungus growth that sours milk.—New York Sun.

A Curious Mineral Formation. Considerable interest has been aroused among foreign miners and metallurgists by the discovery of a new mineral at the famous Broken Hill silver mines, New South Wales. It is an iodide of copper, and is of a dark chocolate color, except that the tips of the house-cone formation are reddish and coritic where fractured. The mineral presents a curious chemical problem, occurring as it does in a silver-bearing lode, and being found in the midst of argentiferous minerals, if not in the presence of silver solutions. Considering the strong affinity of silver for iodide, the presence of copper iodide in such a position is believed to be almost unaccountable.

Egypt in America. The ibis, the sacred bird of Egypt, is not peculiar to that country, but is found in considerable numbers in the south, in Florida especially. In St. Augustine and other coast towns it is no unusual thing to see an ibis perched on the ridge-pole of a house or staidle or staking solemnly about a yard, for the bird is easily tamed and seemed to be fond of human company. Moreover, Detroiters will remember that an Egyptian lotus was discovered a few years since in the River Rouge.

Unpretentious Royalty. The King and Queen of Greece live in the very simple style, cheerfully adapting their expenses to the impious plight of the country, and His Majesty's ten "boards of travel" which he wants to run down to the port (the famous Piræus) at Athens.

BIRTH. At Souris, on Saturday, June 24th, the wife of A. A. McLellan, M. D., of a son.

DIED. At her late residence, Mt. Herbert, Lot 48, on Saturday, July 1, Sarah, widow of the late Donald McLean, in the 75th year of her age.
