MR. GLADSTONE AND THE PREMIERS.

Sir Louis Davies at Gladstone's Right Hand.

The Grand Old Man in High Good Humor.

The visit of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Reid and Mr. Seddon to Mr. Gladstone was an entire success. The party, which included Sir Louis Davies, Canada's Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and was under the kindly escort of Lord and Lady Carrington started from Euston by special train at 3.30, and reached Hawarden shortly before three. At Hawarden they were warmly received by Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone and a considerable family party, consisting of Mr. Gladstone's daughters and grandchildren.

The premiers had an animated talk with Mr. Gladstone for an hour or more, and came away much impressed with his vitality and versatility. The interview was private, but it is breaking no confidences to say that Mr. Gladstone entered freely into the subject of colonial expansion, giving, as one of his audience said, a succinct history of the British colonies. He expressed a cordial sympathy with the free trade movement in the colonies, and with Sir Wilfrid Laurier's commercial policy in Canada. He was happy, he told Sir Wilfrid, to consider himself a follower of his. Some of his friends had suggested that the interview should be limited to twenty minutes, but Mr. Gladstone would not hear of this. "I must have at least an hour," he said, and the time passed away all too quickly. The premiers had tea at Hawarden, and Mr. Gladstone drove with them to the station, an attention which was much appreciated by his visitors. The party spoke again and again of the kindness they had received at Hawarden and the impression made upon them by the great English statesman.

The victors were received by Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone and introduced to the Hon. Mrs. W. H. Gladstone, Mrs. Drew, Miss Helen Gladstone and other members of the family. These ceremonies over, Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Reid led the way to the Hawthorn tree on the lawn in front of the castle, under the cool shade of which afternoon tea was served. Mr. Gladstone, who looked remarkably well and seemed in the brightest spirits, followed with Sir Wilfrid Laurier. During tea Mr. Gladstone talked with the premiers, and from the frequent bursts of merriment it was evident that the conversation was of an amusing nature. Afterwards photographs were taken, with the picturesque ruins of the old castle as a background. Mr. Gladstone occupied the centre position, and on his right were Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Louis Davies, whilst on his left were Mr. Reid and Mr. Seddon. Mr. Gladstone advised his visitors to keep their hats on owing to the sun, but Mr. Reid took his off, remarking: "I could not go back to Australia, sir, if I wore my hat when I was taken with you." Another group was taken, in which, at the request of Mr. Seddon, Mrs. Gladstone and Lady Carrington were included.

The second part of the journey of the colonial party was hardly less pleasing than the first. They arrived at Llarwst—which lies about ten miles inland from Llandudno—by a special train from Hawarden in the evening, and received a welcome, so thoroughly Welsh as to be particularly pleasing to Sir Wilfrid's colleague, who, being a descendant of South Wales, the Welsh proudly called Sir Lewis Davis. It is seemed as if every window in the little grey-stone town had its flag and device, later on its illumination. There was, too, a good band, a town's procession, a little speech-making, rounding off with a Welsh rendering of the "Land of My Fathers" and God Save the Queen. The address was from "the inhabitants of Llanrwst and the Vale of Conway," and said among other things—

"We are proud of our colonies, and of our great Empire, of which they form such an important part, and we can never forget the readiness which our colonial brethren took our part and assisted us in a time of danger. We hardly need remind you that many of the bravest and best of our sons and daughters have made their homes in the distant lands under your beneficent rule, where is to be seen the same old flag, and where they enjoy the rights and privileges of free citizens and the protection of life and property, as in their native land. We look forward with pleasure to a not very distant date when, by the means of your experience and wisdom, combined with that of our statesmen at home, the colonies and the Mother Country will be drawn even closer together, and that greatly to their mutual advantage. We are fully aware of the great sacrifices you and our forefathers made in laying the foundations of our widespread Empire, and thereby securing the mighty heritage which they left us. It is our fervent prayer that by the wise rule of all those in authority throughout the Empire, or, if necessary, by the united power of our mighty arm, our great Empire may be handed down to future generations undiminished and its glory unimpaired."

The framed address was handed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and a copy on parchment was given to the other premiers. In reply to the Canadian Premier made a charming speech. He said in the course of it:

"I have noticed with peculiar pleasure the reference which is made in this address to the fact that many of your brothers and sisters, men and women from Wales, have found their way into the colonies. They are

amongst the most valued citizens which we have, at all events in the Dominion of Canada—(cheers)—and as a proof of that it is with great pride that I tell you that I am accompanied at the present moment by a colleague in the Government of Canada, Sir Louis Davies—(cheers)—who is a man of Welsh descent. (Cheers.) It has been my privilege, in the part of the Dominion in which I reside, to have amongst my neighbors some Welsh miners, who have brought with them from Wales the traditions of their race—a love of order, poetic instinct, and a love of music—(cheers)—and many and many a time it had been my privilege to hear some thirty or forty of them after a hard day's work give us some of their national anthems and some of the tunes they have brought from the hills of Wales (Cheers) Why, I need not tell you that those tunes always move the hearts of Welshmen, and they move the hearts also of those who are not of Welsh descent, but still have in their hearts a love of music. (Cheers) They are much valued citizens. Let me tell you I propose, in their name and the name of their brother Canadians, the sentiments which have been expressed in this address. (Cheers) We are all brothers in the British Empire. Separated though we be by sea, separated though we be by races, still there is one thing in which we are all of accord—we are all of accord in the love which we have and give to this free institution in which we live. (Cheers) Let me hope, let me pray, also, that the angel of war shall never spread its wings over this great Empire; but let me hope that, if it does, the sentiments which were exhibited at one time by the colonies in favor of the Mother Country shall be repeated every time the occasion presents itself. (Cheers) Fellow-countrymen, once more, and from the bottom of my heart, I offer you the most warm and the most sincere expression of my gratitude for this warm welcome which we are privileged to receive in your town today. (Cheers.)

Sunday was spent at Gwydyr Castle as the guests of Lord and Lady Carrington and on Sunday the party drove to Bettws-y-Coed. Lord Carrington and his guests returned to town on Monday morning.

Kaiser William recently met with a curious accident just after he had been expounding the Scriptures to a select congregation of sailor and mariners. His Majesty was looking at the coast scenery from the after-deck of the Hohenzollern, about 11 o'clock on Sunday morning, just before delivery of reports. At that moment a party of sailors, under the direction of petty officers, were moving the canvass used to protect the masts from smoke, when the upper portion of the sailcloth, fastened to the mainmast, suddenly got loose, and instead of being slowly lowered fell heavily in a head. The canvass being caught by the wind as it fell, was blown right aft, and fell edgeways on to the Emperor's head, which was only covered by a naval officer's linen cap. At the same time a short piece of lashing struck his Majesty's left eye, like the cut of a whip. The Emperor at once went into his small cabin on deck to examine his eye in the glass. Feeling great pain, His Majesty went to his own cabin on the lower deck, and, after having his eye bandaged, went to bed by advice of his doctor, in order to obviate all danger of subsequent hemorrhage. This is the third accident that has happened to the Kaiser on his yacht. One day he narrowly escaped being killed by a falling mast. Another time he slipped on the bridge and injured his knee. It is stated that the Kaiser, regarding this accident as a warning not to usurp the functions of a chaplain, has determined to confine himself in the future to his Imperial duties. "Each one to his trade," he remarked to a sympathiser, "and Kaisers will be safe from accidents."

SWALLOWED HIS PRINCIPLES.—Mr. Beauregard, who sold his paper, La Patrie, to Mr. Tarte, but who could not part with his liberalism, has again been heard from. The ex-mayor, writing to a friend, bitterly deplores the fact that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has swallowed every principle the liberal party hold dear, and has indulged in tory platitudes during his jubilee visit that the most rabid conservative would never have been guilty of. Mr. Beauregard declares in substance that it is the fate of the liberal party to have weak men at its head, and he expresses the deepest regret at his inability to be present in Canada in order to combat this new fad of the present government.
