ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

Now 'Slow and sure comes up the golden' time of year, when once more the spell and loveliness of the harvest-tide is spread along the length and breadth of the farmlands.

"I love the time of harvest," a young farmwife smiled the other evening. "I think it's the best time of all the year. It's a time of plenty on farms and besides there's something special about it—it's a calm, dreamy season, restful and pleasant. And the countryside is so pretty, all in gold and green. I know some find it a little sad with the year commencing to die, but to me, that's like the passing of one who has lived long and is ripe for the reaping. Yes, I love the harvest days."

Now the sound of reaping is along the fields and again even places, nations and worlds are concerned and troubled, here quiet rows of stooks fashioned from the sheaves, as always mark their period of seasoning on the amber stubbles. And peace and plenty this was the afternoon set for the opening of the harvest season at Alderlea, but even while the farmers spread the canvas in place on the binder in a move to be off to it, a blue jay called from the spruces by the dam.

"As usual, Chef," I told him, "you have produced something appetizing and different—these meat balls."

"Ah oui, Madame. The meat mixture I made in the manner of a beef loaf, but I used veal instead of beef and seasoned it with 1/4 tsp. allspice. To coat the balls, I used fine-ground roasted peanuts and a very little flour; then sauteed in butter."

Smithfield ham spread for a filling, Madame, for flavor contrast," he explained. "And here in this pan, that I formed from heavy duty aluminum foil, I am grilling havied chicken, livers wrapped in strips of bacon and secured with toothpicks.

"After these substantial hot hors d'oeuvres, I have planned a light main dish—tossed shrimp salad—and for dessert, lemon shesbet on melon sections."
