The bidding:

| North | East | South | West |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1♥ | Pass | 2♠ | Pass |
| 3♣ | Pass | 3 NT | |

Opening lead — seven of spades.

The outcome of many hands is determined by declarer's play to one particular trick. Once declarer gets by this hurdle on such hands, his work is done.

Look at this deal played in a rubber bridge game. North opened with a heart and raised two clubs to three. South ventured three notrump and the battle was on.

West didn't have a clear-cut opening lead, dummy having bid his long suit, so he decided to try and hit partner's suit. Accordingly, he led the seven of spades. East played the king, which held, and then returned the jack.

Everything now depended on South's play to this trick. If he had ducked the jack, he would have made four notrump, but when he covered with the queen, West took the ace and returned a spade to the ten to defeat the contract a trick.

The point in question is whether South should have covered the jack. From declarer's viewpoint, it was a key play that merited close attention.

South should reason that if the seven of spades lead was based on length in spades, it could have been made from one of these combinations: A-10-8-7-x-x, A-10-8-7-x, or A-10-8-7. Ducking the jack would be the winning play if West's lead was from a six-card suit, and ducking or covering the jack would make no difference in the other two cases.

West might also have led the seven of spades from these short-suit combinations: A-8-7, 10-8-7, 7-x-x-x, 7-x, as well as several others more remote. Of course, in the last three cases, South would be better off covering the jack with the queen, but East's play of the king followed by the jack would be inconsistent with any of these holdings. East would hardly be likely to play in this fashion, for example, if his holding were A-K-J-x-x.

It is therefore proper for declarer to duck the jack whether he thinks that West made a short-suit or a long-suit lead. In the actual case, South would have made the contract by ducking.
