CONCLUSION OF MR. MACDONALD'S PAPER.

CHAPTER XVIII

I can not say that the interior of Hay-slope church was remarkable for anything except for the gray age of its oaken pews—great square pews mostly, ranged on each side of a narrow aisle. It was free, indeed, from the modern blemish of galleries. The choir had two narrow pews to themselves in the middle of the right-hand row, so that it was a short process for Joshua Rann to take his place among them as principal bass, and to run to his desk after the singing was over. The pulpit and desk, gray and old as the pews, stood on one side of the arch leading into the chancel, which also had its gray square pews for Mr. Don-nithorne's family and servants. Yet I assure you those gray pews, with the buff-washed walls, gave a very pleasing tone to this shabby interior, and agreed extremely well with the ruddy faces and bright waistcoats. And there were liberal touches of crimson toward the chancel, for the pulpit and Mr. Donnithorne's own pew had handsome crimson cloth cushions; and, to close the vista, there was a crimson altar-cloth, embroidered with golden rays by Miss Lydia's own hand.

But even without the crimson cloth, the effect must have been cheering, when Mr. Irwine was in the desk, looking benig-nantly around on that simple congregation—on the hardy old men, with bent knees and shoulders perhaps, but with vigor left for much hedge-clipping and thatching; on the tall stalwart frames and roughly-cut bronzed faces of the stone-cutters and carpenters; on the half dozen well-to-do farmers, with their apple-cheeked families; and on the clean old women, mostly farm-laborers' wives, with their bit of snow-white cap-border under their black bonnets, and with withered arms, bare from the elbow, folded passively over chests. For none of the old people held books—why should they? none of them could read. But they knew a few "good words" by heart, and their withered lips now and then moved silently, following the service without any very clear comprehension indeed, but with a simple faith in its efficacy to ward off harm and bring blessing. And now all faces were visible, for all were standing up—the little children on the seats, peeping over the edge of the gray pews—while good old Bishop Ken's evening hymn was being sung to one of those lively psalm tunes that died out with the last generation of rectors and choral parish-clerks. Melodies die out, like the pipe of Pan, with the ears that love them and listen for them. Adam was not in his usual place among the singers today, for he sat with his mother and Seth, and he noticed with surprise that Bartle Massey was absent too; all the more agreeable for Mr. Joshua Rann, who gave out his last notes with unusual complacency, and threw an extra ray of severity into the glances he sent over his spectacles at the recalcitrant Will Maskery.

I beseech you to imagine Mr. Irwine looking round on this scene, in his ample white surplice that became him so well, with his powdered hair thrown back, his rich brown complexion, and his finely cut nostril and upper lip; for there was a certain virtue in that benignant yet keen countenance, as there is in all human faces from which a generous soul beams out. And over all streamed the delicious June sunshine through the old windows, with their desultory patches of yellow, red and blue, that threw pleasant touches of color on the opposite wall.

I think, as Mr. Irwine looked round today, his eyes rested a little longer than usual on the square pew occupied by Martin Poyser and his family. And there was another pair of dark eyes that found it impossible not to wander thither, and rest on that round pink-and-white figure. But Hetty was at that moment quite careless of any glances—she was absorbed in the thought that Arthur Donnithorne would soon be coming into church, for the carriage must surely be at the church gate by this time. She had never seen him since she parted with him in the wood on Thursday evening, and oh! how long the time had seemed! Things had gone on just the same as ever on that evening; the wonders that had happened then had brought no changes after them; they were already like a dream. When she heard the church door swinging, her heart beat so she dared not look up. She felt that her aunt was cour-tesying; she courted herself. That must be old Mr. Donnithorne—he always came first, the wrinkled small old man, peering round with short-sighted glances at the bowing and courtesying congregation; then she knew that Miss Lydia was passing, and though Hetty liked so much to look at her fashionable little coal-scuttle bonnet, with the wreath of small roses round it, she didn't mind it today. But there were no more courtesies—no, he was not come; she felt sure there was nothing else passing the pew door but the house-keeper's black bonnet, and the lady's maid's beautiful straw that had once been Miss Lydia's, and on the powdered heads of the butler and footman. No, he was not there; yet she would look now—she might be mistaken—for, after all, she had not looked. So she lifted up her eyebrows and glanced timidly at the cushioned pew in the chancel; but there was no one but old Mr. Donnithorne rubbing his spectacles with his white handkerchief, and Miss Lydia opening the large gilt-edged prayer-book. The chill disappointment was too hard to bear; she felt herself turning pale, her lips trembling; she was ready to cry. Oh, what should we do? Everybody would know the reason; they would know she was crying because Arthur was not there. And Mr. Craig, with the wonderful hot-house plant in his button hole, was staring at her, she knew.

ONE CASE English Market and Fancy Bgkets, just received by Beer & Goff's. Jan 7

Time forbids me to dwell longer on this phase of the subject. I shall next proceed to consider briefly the second part, viz. — Other sources of supply proposed. 1st.
Artesian Wells. I see by Mr. Murdoch's report that an attempt has been made in that direction here which proved a failure.
I cannot do better than read you the opinions of Prof. Nichols, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, respecting Artesian Wells. He says:—"In projecting Artesian Wells for town supply, it is important to know the geological character of the locality where the boring is to be made, and, as far as possible, the source of the water. Indeed, without a particular knowledge of the probable character of the locality, sinking a well is like investing in a lottery, and hardly justifiable as a municipal undertaking. It is true many wells are sunk without the advice of competent authority, and some of them are successful; as a rule they end in failure." He instances the St. Louis, Mo., well, and points to it as instructive in this connection, having cost $10,000,
