Believe New "Missing Link" Is Located
DURBAN, Jan. 6 - (AP) - South African scientists - still blinking from the limelight of fame for their researches on one of man's potential fish ancestors - now believe they are closer home with another "missing link" between man and the apes.
Dr. Kenneth Oakley of the London Natural History Museum is to arrive this week to study the fossilized teeth and jawbones of a prehistoric creature known to scientists as telenthropus or Euhominid.
Oakley will study the findings of John Talbot Robinson, paleontologist with the Transvaal Museum, in the Swartkrans Caves of Southern Transvaal. Robinson was an associate of the late Dr. Robert Broome, famed anthropologist who in 1936 in a letter to the same area.
Robinson made his first findings on telenthropus about two years in the evolution of apes and men ago. The paleontologist, now vacationing here, says he has found all told, five specimens of the creature in the Swartkrans area. His studies now lead him to believe that telenthropus had a complete mixture of the characteristics of Broome's ape man and other forms more closely related to modern man, such as the Java man and the Peking man.

Robinson estimates that telenthropus lived 250,000 to 500,000 years before our times.
All of this comes only about a week after Prof. J. L. B. Smith, South African ichthyologist, confirmed the second discovery in African waters of a living fossil, a fish known as a coelacanth. The coelacanth was the first family of fish with bony skeletons, as distinguished from earlier types with cartilage skeletons.
New York anthropologists say that scientists are still trying to fix the relationship of Robinson's telenthropus to modern man. These scientists, who object to the term "missing link" as over-used and unscientific, point out that if telenthropus is found to have lived far enough back, he might well be one of man's ancestors. Otherwise, they say, he may be a dead-end branch of the evolutionary tree.
