NED ALVORD'S TRIAL.

Continued.

No need to ask who he was. The wild vagabond brother, Dick, whom nothing but a little quibble had saved from the penitentiary. The thief, whom they never thought of without a blush, was at home again. Since he left Covington two years before, no news had come back of him; and the wretched mother felt, with a shudder, that the news of his death would be almost the best she could expect to receive of him.

He entered the room—a coarse, burly-looking ruffian, with a loud, overbearing voice and manner.

'Hilloa, youngster, you here? Don't seem over-glad to see your elder brother. Blest if you aint the same slip of a boy, without a bit of muscle yet! So you're playin' nigger for old Erless, are you? Catch me at that sort of business. I'll be my own master as long as I live; and nobody's servant. Well old woman, if I'm the prodigal son you ain't treatin' me in a Scripture-like manner. Blessed if you've offered me a bite or a sup since I came in!'

'I forgot that you must be hungry, Dick,' she said in a desponding voice, raising from her seat and hurriedly setting the supper on the table.

Ned noticed with a pang that the old cowed, frightened look had come back to her eyes. His mother had always feared her bad son quite as much as she had feared his bad father.

There was no conversation that night. Dick talked and cursed awhile, and then went to bed; and then his mother crept up to her bed, afraid to discuss his return within his hearing. Poor Ned sat by the embers, his face buried in his hands, and a cruel pressure on his heart.

Had Dick come back to disgrace them again, to make them ashamed to lift up their heads among their neighbors? The shadow had crossed the threshold once more, and were they to sicken in it again? But as he sat there other thoughts began to strengthen him for the struggle he felt was impending.

'I have my employer's confidence,' he thought, 'and he will not turn me off because Dick has come back, even if he is bad. If possible I'll do my duty more strictly."

Had his mother been a stronger woman, he knew that Dick would not have been allowed to bring the leprosy of his life among them again. She would have sent him off; but, as I said, a long course of bad treatment had broken the poor woman's will; and besides, she feared her son.

'So wild Dick's got back,' said Mr. Erless the next morning to Ned. 'Reformed, eh?—or has he come because he's nowhere else to go?'

'I don't know, sir,' he answered frankly. 'We asked him no questions last night.

'Bad things for you and for your mother,' said the merchant. 'Better have nothing to do with him. If your mother knew her duty, she'd ship him to-day. I've one warning to give you, Ned, and you must heed it,—never speak of the business of the store before that man. I trust you,' looking keenly at Ned, 'and you must show yourself worthy of my confidence.'

'He distrusts me already,' thought poor Ned, with a swelling heart, 'or he would not put my duty before me with that look on his face.'

He went to his work with his usual alacrity, but his step was heavier and his face very grave.

But somehow, as the day passed away Dick Alvord seemed so much quieter than usual that Ned's forebodings were forgotten. Dick was still lazy and shiftless—he did not try to make a living, but spent his time at the grog-shops; but he did not get as drunk as formerly, and was less quarrelsome and noisy. In fact, he seemed to have settled down into one of those nuisances who loaf around bar-rooms to be treated by weak customers, and who die oftner in gutters than in jails. Yet he was seldom seen really intoxicated, and was no longer the brawler he had been.

One night two respectable-looking strangers stopped at the bar where he was drinking. There was no sign of greeting between the vagabond and the well-dressed man. They had entered to ask some questions as to the locality of a boarding-house in that street, but when Dick lounged out they followed him, not only down the street, but to a bridge in an unfrequented spot. There he stopped and waited for them.

(Concluded in our next.)

'Zakiel' predicted that in the month of June 'a youthful Prince' would suffer from the conjunction of Mars with Saturn. The Prince Imperial was killed in June. 'Zadkiel' also predicts trouble among the great in July.

Liver is King.

The liver is the imperial organ of the whole human system, as it controls the life, health and happiness of man. When it is disturbed in its proper action, all kinds of ailments are the natural result. The digestion of food, the movements of the heart and blood, the action of the brain and nervous system, are all immediately connected with the workings of the liver. It has been successfully proved that Green's August Flower is unequalled in curing all persons afflicted with dyspepsia or liver complaint, and all the numerous symptoms that result from an unhealthy condition of the liver and stomach. Sample bottles to try, 10 cents. Positively sold in all towns on the Western Continent. Three doses will prove that it is just what you want.
