RIPLEY'S BELIEVE IT OR NOT

CONTRACT BRIDGE

By B. JAY BECKER

South dealer. Neither side vulnerable.

NORTH: A Q 4, K 6 4 2, Q 8 5 2, J 9. WEST: A 7 3, K Q J 9 7, K, K 10 7 6. EAST: 10 9 6 5 2, 7 3, 7 4 3, 8 5 2. SOUTH: A K J, A J 10 8, A Q 4 3.

The bidding: South West North East 1 1 2 4 3 NT.

Opening lead—king of hearts. This hand comes from a rubber bridge game. South was playing three notrump. He got a heart lead, ducked the king, then the queen, and won the third heart with the ace.

He entered dummy with the queen of spades and led the eight of diamonds, losing the finesse to the singleton king. West cashed two hearts and South went down one.

The point we'd like to make is that South should not have taken the diamond finesse. His play was based more on habit than reason.

After winning the ace of hearts the proper play is the ace of diamonds, rejecting the possible finesse. It so happens in this deal that the ace would have caught the lone king and resulted in making ten tricks, but before we get accused of basing our play on a peek at West's hand we hasten to give the reason for the play.

It is a basic principle in practically all hands that declarer's first concern is to make the contract. The proper method in most hands of handling a specific combination of cards in a suit (in this case, diamonds) may easily not be the proper method in a particular hand.

The question of which opponent may win the trick if a normal finesse is taken may be sufficient to persuade declarer that the finesse should not be taken if it unnecessarily jeopardizes the hand as a whole.

Int his deal South cannot lose the contract if East has the king of diamonds, whether the finesse is taken or not. Declarer is still sure of at least nine tricks if he first leads the ace of diamonds and then concedes the jack to East's hoped for king.

Declarer therefore improves his chances by leading the diamond ace since it gives him the added chance that West may have been dealt the unguarded king.

So while it must be granted South had moderately bad luck in losing the diamond finesse, the fact is he also contributed to his own defeat.

tional conference on human rights.

Asked from the floor whether workers should seek representation by a political wing, lawyer-economist Pierre Elliott Trudeau of Montreal said Canada definitely needs such a party.

Organized labor shouldn't have to march on Ottawa every time a grievance arose. Workers should spend "less time marching and more time voting," Mr. Trudeau said.

William Mahoney, national director of the United Steelworkers of America (U.S.W.), said he is "absolutely convinced" that protection of workers should be strengthened by labor action in the legislative field.

Prof. Harry Woods, industrial relations expert at McGill University, said he is uncertain whether university personnel should identify themselves with a particular political party. Personally, he had no objection to a party of social reform.

No reference was made to current efforts by the CCF and Canadian Labor Congress to establish a new political party based on organized labor and farm groups.

The panel discussion was one of three on the second day of a three-day conference organized in connection with the 10th anniversary of the United Nations universal declaration of human rights. The meeting, described as a national stocktaking of Canada's performance in relation to the UN declaration, ends today.

HIGH PUBLISHING COSTS A panel devoted to civil liberties produced general agreement that minority opinions are hard to get across to the public, partly because of the high cost of publishing.

Rumblings of discontent about the place of the intellectual in Canadian society were heard. Montreal newspaper man Jean-Louis Gagnon said Canadians have less individual freedom than citizens of Britain, Sweden, Belgium and France, simply because intellectuals command greater respect there.

STRONG-ARM TACTICS A third group, discussing social rights, brought a complaint by Montreal union official Gerard Pelletier about strong-arm methods against strikers.

Mr. Pelletier said he doesn't think a Canadian would ever win a case against a policeman.
