ELLEN'S DIARY

Sweet Maple Syrup Can Brighten Damp Fall Day

Granddaughter, a fortunate young miss, as is these times, many other rural student privilliged to commute from home to city seats of learning went out in a shower this morning. Not on foot today, but happily chauffeured by Mack, as far as Jane's end...

"Now how long is your lane, Ellen" one who has never visited Alderlea, inquired the other day. "Would it be a mile?"

It is actually not more than a step, a matter of only a two minutes' walk to reach its bridge across the stream, and just past it, lane's end. There was a time in our farming with James, before any motor-driven vehicles frequented the roadway, when in summer a gate guarded the entrance there. When we excursioned from the farm, this occasioned a pause there to allow for its opening and closing. And if one were driving alone, and bound homeward, the latter must be done in haste, lest the old mare, our driver, should suddenly succumb to a yearning to come to her stall and leave us to walk up to the yard!

"How is it that one knows the very instant he sets foot on home - soil?" Mack wondered one day recently. "It's a fact. There's no denying it."

"It's all in the mind" a visitor chuckled.

"No. It's in the heart" we said.

A day of rain, this was. It offered the cook a time and season to serve her household her most attractive fare. We had a dinner of steak, with onion rings to highlight it, and the brown tasteful gravy which comes only from the choice cuts of beef. With it, potato and turnip. And to add a piquant taste to the whole, a spiced apple relish.

"Now what are we to have for dessert?" Alex asked, he, having stopped by to the meal.

"We have hot rolls. Now wouldn't this be the day to open that gift-tin of maple syrup? Haven't we been saving it since the spring, for just such a cheerless day as is this?"

He smiled. "It should sweeten it" he nodded.

"And we can imagine we are there in that sugar bush with the March-sun smiling down on us" we said. "No rain there, but a warm sunny wind. And the sap running from the great maple trees. And spring showing in the blue of the sky. And we'll be remembering the kindly folks who put our names in the pot in which the syrup was made on their interesting farm in Quebec."

Rolls and maple syrup were our dessert at dinner...with eaves dripping out of doors and damp leaves drifting down indifferently from the branches of the golden willow in the yard.

Damp the day was. But our farmers busied themselves at chores about. There were sties to clean and bed; a new trough to fashion; a creep to make for some small ones; a window inserted in a repaired granary, which up to this has never held grain.

"Put another stick on the fire, Ellen" James says, come in now at his day's end. ,And close the door against the night."

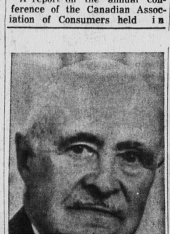
"No moon?" we ask.

"Nor star. But "he smiles, hope being a heart-warming thing, "we have been promised sunshine tomorrow!"

Until tomorrow — — Diary — Good-night.....

Annual Conference Report Is Heard By CAC Members

A report on the annual conference of the Canadian Association of Consumers held in Kingston, Ont., in June, given by Mrs. J.A. Lawson, highlighted a meeting of the P. E. I. branch of the CAC held on Tuesday at the National Film Board Room in Charlottetown.



TREASURER

Seen above is J.A. Lawson, Charlottetown, recently appointed treasurer of the local UNICEF committee. Mr. Lawson has opened a special account at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce to receive contributions to the organization.

The highlight of Mrs. Lawson's report concerned the transformation of the CAC into a testing organization; and she pointed out that the financial responsibility for the CAC had been transferred from individual directors to a corporate body as a necessary step in the development of the CAC as a testing organization.

Mrs. Lawson pointed out to those attending the meeting that the president of the CAC of Canada and an official of the Consumer Relations Section of the Food and Drug Directorate had attended conferences in London, Eng., and Brussels, Belgium to gather information on testing programs.

The CAC committee on testing has drawn up a preliminary list of projects for two issues of a testing bulletin and research has already begun on six products, a drug, a household product, two electrical appliances and some household linen and some watches.

As soon as testing results are available the CAC Bulletin will be replaced by a larger quarterly testing bulletin. She announced that the present subscription rate of the bulletin would carry until the testing bulletin is started, but that all re-newals and new subscriptions will be at a higher rate. Mrs. Lawson pointed out that re-newals and new subscriptions would be a great help in financing this testing project. The new bulletin will contain the results of the testing plus all the present articles on CAC activities and buying guides, all of interest to the consumer.

Mrs. Lawson also spoke briefly on Canada Standard Sizes, pointing out that so far specifications for 19 kinds of garments have been issued. She also pointed out that the Food Committee has been working on such problems as bacon packaging, standards for comminuted beef, metal sealer rings, fat and oils, canned fish, olive oil, and dairy products.

Tuesday's meeting was chaired by Mrs. Lorne MacLellan, president of the Island branch of the CAC who also reported on Canada Standard Sizes and a demonstration on measuring children to determine proper size. Reports from the treasurer and the membership committee were also dealt with.

At the close of the meeting a film "Hosiery Fact and Fashions" showed the history, manufacture and care of nylon stockings.
