

Daniel Webster's Only Poem.

Webster, it is said, during his whole literary life, wrote but one poem, and that was upon the death of his infant son.

My son, thou wast my heart's delight; Thy morn of life was gay and cheery;

I held thee on my knee, my son, And kissed thy laughing, kissed thee weeping.

The staff on which my years should lean Is broken ere those years came o'er me;

Thou parent to me no filial stone, No parent to partake thy tears beholdest;

On earth my lot was soonest cast, Thy generation after mine;

I shall have set before thine eyes The road to heaven, and showed it clear;

Sweet seraph, I would learn of thee, And hasten to partake thy bliss;

Thy father, I beheld thee born, And led thy tottering steps with care;

A new bank which had been established in a town in Indiana, had engaged the services of a watchman who came well recommended, but who did not seem over-experienced.

"Yes, sir." "Your first duty must be to exercise vigilance."

"Be careful how strangers approach you." "I will, sir."

"No stranger must be permitted to enter the bank at night under any pretext whatever."

"No, sir." And our cashier—he is a good man, honest, reliable, and thoroughly trustworthy,

"But it will be hard to watch two men and the bank at the same time, sir."

"Two men—how?" "Why, sir, it was only yesterday that the cashier called me in for a talk,

The Prince of Wales' son George struck up a violent flirtation with a lovely little girl of 15 (looking older, as girls do there).

Facing the powder:—"No aunt," said young Folkestone, "I don't get on well at all with Clara. And, by the way, there's one thing I don't like."

A school teacher asserts that scholars who have access to newspapers at home outstrip those in their studies who do not see the papers, becoming better readers and spellers, better grammarians, and writing the best compositions, besides learning geography and history quicker.

"Strange," remarked Mrs. Brown, "I have rung at Mrs. Smith's door three times this week, and I didn't succeed in raising any one. I guess the family is out of town."

The Pope has consented to be presented at the coronation of the Czar.
