IN MEMORIAM

MRS. JAMES P. BECK
Mrs. James P. Beck, age 67, wife of James P. Beck died on January 4th, at her home, 114 Parkview Ave Bangor Me., after a short illness.

Surviving besides her husband are a son, Albert, of Bangor, a cousin, Mrs. Wynne Lewis Youngs, several nieces and nephews.

Funeral services for Mrs. Beck were held January 7th at St. John's Roman Catholic Church, Bangor, Me., with High Mass of Requiem, with Rev. Raymond Begin as celebrant.

Bearers were Charles E. Milan, Jr., James Kellaher, William Hackett, Calvin Knaide, James McDonald and Alfred Winslow. Interment was in the family lot, At Mt. Pleasant Cemetery, with prayers by Rev. Joseph H. Butler.

Mrs. Beck had a wide circle of friends in Bonshaw, Green Road, also Charlottetown and other parts of the Island. She has been coming to the Island for over 35 years, with her husband and son Albert.

Her husband was born on the Green Road, Bonshaw. She loved the Island, and all its people. May She Rest in Peace.

ANSWER: On the off chance that it might help, tell your sister. Her probable reaction will be that she doesn't believe a word of your story but since an estrangement is already in effect, you probably won't make things any worse.

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

Trees are among the oldest living things on earth. We read of trees 1,000 years old at the birth of Christ. The life span of some sequoias had paralleled the recorded history of mankind for the past 3,000 years.

Some still proudly lifting their heads among the clouds were getting their first growing pains five centuries before the Periclean period of ancient Greece.

Turning from the age of the sequoia we shall, for a few paragraphs, discuss their size. It is not too difficult to compute the weight in a single size. It is not too difficult to compute the weight in a single log; some weigh as much as 1,500 tons. The most ponderous big trees probably are nearer 2,000 tons. Equal to the size of a small steamship.

The General Sherman tree contains as much lumber as 12 acres of average forest pine. Sawn into lumber this monarch of the forest would build 25 six-room houses.

These hulking giants towering into the air like skyscrapers are favorite targets for lightning. Yet strange to say, it rarely if ever kills a tree.

Some years ago lightning struck one of California's big trees and it burned from August to December. With the lowest limb 100 feet above ground firemen were helpless to combat the flames.

A single sequoia twenty feet in diameter from Redwood Mountain yielded 7,700 seven-foot fence posts. But the Sequoia ranks only third or fourth in height. The Redwood, the Douglas fir and the Australian eucalyptus, grow taller.

The big trees are rich in tannin, a chemical whose presence in such heavy proportions helps make the trees resistant to fungus and insect attack. This largely explains their longevity.

A sequoia felled in 1883 was so large that it took five men 22 days to complete the job. A powerful alley was laid out on the fallen trunk, and the stump provided ample dancing space for a real old-fashioned hoe-down!

The ordinary or common firefly such as we have in the Garden of the Gulf, has a light beam equal to twenty candles. But in the American tropics may be seen a large species of firebug. Four or five together make a light strong enough so newspapers can be read.

People keep these big fire bulbs in cages and wear them by night as living jewels. In religious processions in Panama, for example, Beetle brooches and hairpins are worn by the ladies. And believe it or not, these inch long bugs have twin "headlights" that glow with green light; on their underside a yellow light shines intermittently in flight. These strange fireflies can be attached unharmed to dress or hair by passing a pin through the joint of the insect's body.

Stranger still is the South American beetle, phrixothrix, second cousin to the firefly. It looks so much like a lighted train in motion that the creature is called railway worm. And no wonder, with its red headlight, and eleven pairs of green lamps shining along its sides!

Until the white man ventured on the great plains about 1850, the Indians living in the region never heard of mumps or measles or smallpox. They never suffered from the common cold or pneumonia or T. B. Like the deadly fire-water, they were all brought from Europe by white people. The redmen never having had these ailments soon fell victim to the diseases.

The first temperance meeting held in North America took place in 1648 at Sillery, a suburb of Quebec where a settlement of Christianized Indians had been located.

The first recorded triplets of Canadian birth were born in Montreal in 1665, and the first twins were born in the same city, July 2, 1649.

The wearing of wooden shoes is not confined entirely to the low countries, wooden shoes were quite common in rural districts of Canada as late as the 18th century. The writer saw a man wearing such shoes last August, while driving through the Fredericton.

French Canadian homes used oiled paper for their window lights.
