Crew Rounds Out Training For First Trials Of Atom-Powered Submarine

WASHINGTON (AP)—Sailors of the first U.S. fusion fleet are polishing off the training they need to operate the world's first atomic submarine. During much of the last three years, the men have lived and worked on an arid plain in Idaho, while they helped to build and learned to operate the original, land-based prototype of the nuclear power plant that will drive the USS Nautilus. At the navy's New London, Conn., submarine base the crew trains daily either in boats operating out of the base or in an amazing piece of machinery called the Astoria device. It contains all the controls and simulates all the conditions of a submarine operating at sea. The Nautilus will be ready for the big day probably sometime later this summer or early fall when she heads down the Thames river for Long Island sound where the initial trials will be run. NO MOVIE THRILLER The Nautilus' first dive presumably won't be the spectacular, "Take her down," type of swift glide beneath the surface seen in movie thrillers of undersea warfare. Instead, the Nautilus will be stopped dead in the water, floating motionless. Then the hydraulic control men will flood her down slowly, opening and closing vents in the ballast tanks in short, quick bursts to prevent a sudden in-surge of water. Slowly the point will be reached where the atomic submarine has only a tiny fraction of "positive" buoyancy, just enough so she floats with deck awash. When and if the Nautilus proves out to the satisfaction of all her technical and operating hands she will put out to the open sea for the deep dive trials.
