JUNIOR FARMERS SHORT COURSE

The P. E. I. Junior Farmers Federation is planning a short course this year which will be directed and assisted by the Provincial Department of Agriculture...

Miss Mary Robin of the Women's Institute Branch. Here is a recipe for a Christmas tea-ring very attractive whole-some and delicious.

Holiday Kringle

2 cups sifted all-purpose flour 1-2 tablesp. granulated sugar 1-2 teasp. salt 1-2 cup soft shortening 1-2 cup milk 1 pkg. active dry yeast 1-4 cup warm (not hot) water 1 egg yolk 1 cup finely chopped nuts 1-2 cup finely chopped candied cherries 1 egg white, slightly beaten Into large bowl, sift flour, sugar, salt. Using pastry blender, or 2 knives, scissor-fashion, cut in shortening until like corn meal. Scald milk, cool till lukewarm. Sprinkle yeast into water in small bowl; stir until dissolved. Into lukewarm milk, stir egg yolk, then yeast. Now stir this mixture into flour mixture, mixing well. Scrape dough down from sides of bowl. Cover tightly with waxed paper then with damp cloth. Refrigerate to 48 hr., no longer.

Before removing dough from refrigerator, combine cherries, nuts. Divide dough in half; keep half covered while shaping other half. On lightly floured surface, roll half of dough into 18" x 6" rectangle. Spread with half of egg white, then with half of cherry mixture. Fold long sides to center, over filling; pinch together. Carefully place kringle, with seam side down, on lightly greased cookie sheet. Repeat, placing second kringle on second cookie sheet. Bake each with damp cloth, rise in warm place (about 85 degrees F.) until almost doubled in bulk - from 30 min. to 1-1-2 hr., depending on length of time dough has chilled. Keep cloth damp so it does not stick to dough.

Meanwhile, start heating oven 400 degrees F. Bake kringle 20 to 30 min., or until golden brown. 1-2" edges, sprinkle with sifted confectioners sugar; let cool on wire rack. Makes 30 wedges.

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

Now come the buffaloes! Not one at a time like the elephants, but three or four together, as there is strength in union. Herds usually are made up of 20 or 30 animals, and of course the males lead the way and are the first to drink. When they have slaked their thirst they retire to the rear of the herd, and stand with their faces facing the jungle. Why? So that their tiger enemies may not catch them unawares.

Meanwhile the second group step into the water to drink. When they've had their fill they, too, take up position at the back of the herd.

The mothers, together with their calves, next approach the water. They are wedged in the middle, safe from all harm.

But just a moment, please! Before the buffalo disappear into the jungle, an amazing thing happens. A very frightened deer is seen approaching with a dreadful tiger creeping and padding about behind it. Just as soon as the deer sights the buffalo herd leaving the water she creeps in towards them, sometimes sheltering under their horns, knowing that she will be quite safe from her enemy. Do the buffalo resent this? Not a bit of it. Like the brave knight of old, they feel proud of protecting a lady.

When the dangerous tiger is left well behind the deer leaves her protectors. She is safe.

There is no such thing as pure or clean air. It is always full of dust, smoke and so on. It comes nearest to being pure, however, after a heavy rain has washed most of the dust out of the sky. At such times the sunlight often looks white. But the most beautiful sunsets are caused by smoke and dust because they tend to break up the white light of old sol.

Proof of this is that after a great volcanic eruption throwing great quantities of fine dust into the air, the sunsets are indescribably beautiful.

An example of this phenomena took place in the 17th century when, after an eruption in Japan, so much dust floated over the world that for six months the strange and beautiful sunsets frightened folk everywhere. Since people didn't know what caused it, they assumed that the end of the world was coming. Some persons in Europe gave away their farms and dug their graves and calmly or hysterically awaited the day of judgment. But the dust settled down finally and the rains washed it away, and the old world ticked on as it had done since its creation.

The North American Indians had a pretty legend about the rainbow. They said it was made up of the souls of the dead flowers. Poet Longfellow refers to this in the following lines:

"And the good Nokomis answered: 'Tis the heaven of flowers you see there; All the wild flowers of the forest. All the lilies of the prairie. When on earth they fade and perish. Blossomed in that heaven above us."

We And Our Neighbors

THE REAL YOU

Last week in our effort to gain an understanding of the real you - your true personality... we did get past the outer self, the appearance and behaviour forming the "expressive" or mask aspect of personality and we did launch upon the intricate task of probing into the inner self or the inner aspect of personality.

This inner self is built up out of the individual's own interpretation of his experiences, past and present, and of his own needs and desires. A wonderful example of this is the impression left on a group of two travellers to a distant country. One will "rave" about the food and the bargains he found; another will tell of age-old customs and its effect on the life of the people; one will find it a friendly, inspiring region another will consider it a dull place and the trip a waste of money. There will be almost as many reactions as travellers.

We can continue the comparison and say we are all travellers in the same world yet view it quite differently by reason of our own particular beliefs, attitudes, hopes and desires as our experience have molded them.

Playing a most important part in our inner world is the opinion we have formed of ourselves, or our self regard or "self-concept". Do we consider ourselves something special, or just tolerable, or of no particular account? Whatever the actual facts, we will feel inwardly, and act outwardly accordingly to the self-concept that has arisen out of our experiences.

Of these experiences the earliest ones in the home probably carry the greatest weight. The home is the entire world of the child. The parents are the source of everything he wants or needs. They can give or withhold, and even cause pain and discomfort of various kinds. Their opinion of him is therefore of the utmost importance.

In a loving home where the child is gently guided and gradually into acceptable social behavior, the child gives up his own preferred ways of acting without resentment and out of love for his parents. As his world expands he carries the same attitude with him. He moves freely and greets new people and new experiences with self-confidence and friendliness.

In the opposite type of home (and of course there are an infinite number of shades between) the child is pushed and punished into doing what "a nice child" should do according to his parents. He is praised seldom if ever and repeatedly told he is "a bad boy."

Miss Brown, the teacher, for example, has two utterly different boys in her class. Eddie reveres her any trouble and she seldom even calls on him. When she thinks of him at all she dismisses him with a few words - "he is that very shy, polite little boy." He hands in his home-work and passes his tests. What more can she want?

But oh, that Tommy! What a bully, what a nuisance in class and on the playground! He does his home-work all right. His parents see to that. And he manages to get by in his tests for the same reason. But it seems they can't force him to behave in school, and neither can she. He is just one of those characters you can't like, she feels. And the children certainly don't like him.

But the inner world of both boys is very similar and their behavior is directed by their experiences in the home and the sense of their own worthlessness derived from their parents. But Eddie has always been small and weak and has found through trial and error that his only way to avoid trouble is to avoid attention - keep out of the way as much as possible.

But Tommy is larger and stronger than his class-mates. O. K. He'll show them! Both boys are in need of help. Shy Eddie more even than Tommy, the bully.

(Next week I shall deal briefly with such physical characteristics and other factors that influence personality.)

The Women's Institutes of Cherry Valley and Earncliffe have had classes this past week in Teatime, Stencilling, glove-making and slip-covering of furniture.
