

Couldn't Eat a Meal without Dizzy Spells, Severe Pains

Engineer now happy that Sarnak relieved these conditions and he is able to enjoy eating his meals for the first time in sixteen years!

GUSTAV ROEMER

After years of suffering with upset stomach, dizzy spells, nervousness and indigestion, it's little wonder a man recommends the remedy that's made them a thing of the past! And that's just what Mr. Gustav Roemer, 138 Ahrens St. W., Kitchener, Ontario, does. He says— "I gladly recommend Sarnak to anyone who suffers as I did. For sixteen years or more, I had a bad, upset stomach, which prevented me from eating a regular meal without severe pain. Besides this, I was constipated all the time; almost afraid to eat, had dizzy spells and was nervous.

Many who suffer as Mr. Roemer did, have found Sarnak of real benefit. And others, made miserable from eating a regular meal without severe pain. Besides this, I was constipated all the time; almost afraid to eat, had dizzy spells and was nervous.

When I heard of Sarnak I started to take it, and it brought me relief within a few days. I can truly say my nervousness is relieved and I now enjoy a good night's sleep, am regular, eat better and am relieved of my stomach upset. I'm so grateful for what Sarnak has done for me."

Tomorrow's Promise

By Temple Bailey

When he was gone, Elinor said to Vicky, "You knew there wasn't a fire."

"I knew there was danger." The two women gazed steadily at each other and Elinor said, "Well, what of it? My life is my own."

"But Anne?"

"Is her happiness so much more important than mine?"

"Vicky, standing in front of the fire, said, 'I don't know. I only know that she has burned candles on your altar and you have blown them out.'"

"What do you mean?"

"To night she saw David kiss you."

There was dead silence for a moment, then Elinor said, "She'll have to know sometime. Do you think I am going on like this—with Francis living his own life? I have the same right to live mine."

"Neither of you has a right. You have a child."

Elinor threw herself into a chair, and the rose and silver of her gown and the deeper rose of the chair's back seemed to mock the whiteness of her face.

"How much is she my child? You've been with her since she was five. You've taken my place. And Francis did that, not I."

"He did it because you said you hated being tied down."

But there was more to it than that. Vicky had not told the whole story. Of how Francis Ordway had come home one night from Baltimore to find Anne with raging fever and in the care of an ignorant nursemaid, while Elinor was off to a hunt ball at the country club.

When he telephoned her, she had refused to come until the dancing was over. So Francis had sent for Vicky and Vicky had stayed.

Elinor, knowing what was in Vicky's mind, flung out, "How long do you think he would have loved me if I'd been tied to a child? And had lost my looks? Oh, I know men! You've never been married, Vicky."

Looking into the fire Vicky said, "No, but if I had had a child like Anne, nothing else would have mattered."

The way in which she said it struck at Elinor's heart. And because of that blow her voice was shrill. "Oh, I know you're a saint, Vicky. But I'm not. And Francis is a pig. I lost a lot tonight and I didn't dare ask David to help me out. Do you think it is true, Vicky, what Francis said? That David is in debt to him?"

"He wouldn't have said it if it weren't true," Vicky stated positively.

"I know, Francis doesn't lie. I'll say that for him. But why shouldn't he give me all the money I want?"

"Times are a bit bad."

But Elinor knew, as Vicky knew, that it was not the bad times which had made Francis withhold all that his wife wanted. Her losses of late had been so great that she had used desperate means to get money to pay them.

Now she was at her wife's end, and in spite of her resentment of Vicky's interference in her affairs, it seemed as if Vicky after all was the only stable thing in her world. Yet, preversely, she almost hated Vicky for the virtues which she herself did not possess.

So she snapped, "You don't know life as I do!"

Vicky knew that what Elinor meant was that she had not been loved by men, that she was not beautiful, or provocative, or fascinating. And Vicky, standing there in her nurse's white, wondered how things would have been if she, instead of Elinor, had worn the rose and silver gown.

But she did not speak of that. She only said, weighing her words, "Life is bigger than either of us, and we have to make the best of it. And above all, we've got to make the best of it for Anne. There's no sin like killing faith and hope in a young heart."

Then, as Elinor said sharply, "Don't preach," they heard the big car outside.

In another moment Francis entered. He stopped on the threshold and looked his surprise. "Not in bed yet?" he asked.

Dorothy Dix Says—

Give your future to gratify your wife's whim. You would be weak to let her pull you around by the nose and make you do a thing that you know will jeopardize your entire career just because she wants to be near Mamma and the girls, and you would be foolish because your sacrifice would be made in vain. For when she found out that you were not making as much money in the new environment as you did in the old she would be just as disgruntled and unhappy over it as she is about having to live away from her old home now.

A man should think a long time before he throws up a certainty for a chance somewhere else. It is a wife's place to follow her husband and to adapt herself to whatever place in which he finds his opportunity, and a good wife and one who loves her husband does so. I wonder what our pioneer mothers would think of the wives who cannot stand the hardship of living a few miles away from their own families and friends.
